The Home Office originally greeted us with some antagonism and, although I say this to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Citizenship and Immigration in real friendship, we felt somewhat slighted at the time. At no point were we attempting to discover dreadful secrets. We just wanted to know what was being done in a general sense. For example, when the Committee was examining what was happening on the London tube, we did not want to know details about the District line or the Circle line; rather, we wanted to know that general problems were being looked at, that questions were being asked and that progress was being made. That information was hard to get. The Foreign Affairs Committee—for obvious reasons—encountered much the same attitude during its work on Iraq. The problem is getting to people. If they do not want to answer a Select Committee member's question, fine—they can say, "I'll write to you," or, "I'll have to take advice on this." We are not there to nail people to the carpet and put them under that pressure. Our job in Select Committees is to allow the public to see that there is proper, open scrutiny of processes in this place. As politicians, it does us good to engage in such processes. I have got that off my chest now. I hope that we never have to go through such an experience again.

When we conduct inquiries, we talk to the Chairmen of other Select Committees so that we do not cross each another. For example, when we examined scientific teaching in schools, I had no problem with my opposite number on the Education and Skills Committee—we talked about the problem, each asking the other whether his Committee wanted to do the job. On another subject, I might say, "No, you do it", to which the reply might be, "Great, we'll keep in touch". That is the spirit we need, especially in the field of science and technology, which crosses boundaries.

The US National Academy of Science undertook studies of the scientific response to terrorism—that is why we went there; we knew that the people there were up to the work. The information that the academy gave the US Government about the gaps in capability was published freely. The academy agreed to limit distribution of only one chapter, an agricultural study, which was fair—that chapter was about problems in the agricultural mid-west and so on. For a long time, the only studies that we came across in this country were secret and denied to us. Those who think that we might have been overstepping the mark must forgive us, because we had the American example before us. I appreciate that American society is wide open and the people there love talking—well, I wonder sometimes, but more seems to come out there because of their structures and the openness of American society. Many of us feel that that is something that we in this country might mimic.

I am interested in that topic, because my friend Sir David King, the chief scientific adviser, told our inquiry:

> "I have . . . travelled around the United States and talked to a large number of groups both in private and in public and . . . I would say it becomes immediately apparent to me I can say less in public about what we are doing than my counterparts in the United States could say".

That statement is illustrated by recent events, when David King was told to shut up about climate change versus terrorism and so on. I might add that David King has said similar things to others down the line. The problem is partly to do with our culture and the way we work. Our experience is that that does not happen in the United States to quite the same extent, and it was illuminating to see how easy it is to conduct work on science and terrorism there.

It was a great privilege to visit the top brass at Fort Dietrich, the Lawrence Livermore, universities, Capitol Hill, the Department of Homeland Security, the Department of Health and Human Services and other places that I had never in my whole life imagined I would visit. I never felt that there was any question that those people would not answer, except for one moment in Riverside, California. The chap speaking to us said, "I'm not sure I should be telling you this, but I will anyway." He told someone else to go out just to check and carried on speaking. The other guy came back and said, "It's okay, carry on." Well, the chap had said it by then. That atmosphere made us feel that we were learning something and that we could apply that information to the situation in this country.

As my right hon. Friend the Minister herself told the Committee, secrecy is not in itself something that we should protect and hold up as a virtue. We should try to open things up.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that all the information that we were given in confidence at establishments that we visited in this country remained confidential, and that is extremely important because it means that our Select Committee—indeed, all Select Committees—can be trusted with such information?

Dr. Gibson: Of course I confirm that. The Select Committee visited various places in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, including Porton Down. There can be nowhere more secret than Porton Down, which is at the forefront in its work to protect the nation and solve problems. Its staff are so knowledgeable. However, I have to say that most of their work is in defence, not civil defence. We discovered that more work goes into Ministry of Defence projects than protecting the public.

I believe that I represent the Select Committee when I say that the more the public know, the more confident they become. Although there are limits, of course, trust becomes an issue if the public believe that they are not being given information. We hear that all the time, whether we are talking about genetically modified crops, measles, mumps and rubella-MMR-jabs or Iraq. Politicians have to judge when to release information to make people feel better. For example, the Washington metro issued a press release describing how its detection system would operate in the event of a chemical or biological weapon attack. I do not particularly want to know the details; I instantly forget them anyway, and I am much more interested in other things that happen in the United States. However, the fact that the information is available on a website allows people to feel that something is being done, whether it is detecting a radiological weapon, a biological weapon or whatever. That contrasts with our Committee's efforts to find information about the tube in this country.

As many people have said, there is a heightened risk in this country. People travel on the tube in the morning. I travel to work at 7 o'clock. That is, of course, when the working classes go to work, so fewer of them are likely to be blown up. I suppose that the time to hit the middle classes would be at 9 o'clock in the morning. Both early-morning tube goers and tube goers who travel later in the morning need to know what would happen if someone released something. If someone had released something in Parliament square this morning, I would have had every confidence in the services' response. I watched how the police instantly cleared the place and the fire brigade got to work. That is fine in London, but would that happen at the Forum in Norwich if, one Saturday morning, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills and I were leading the charge and talking to members of the public about a major higher education issue? Suppose that they were all in there listening and drinking coffee—I assure hon. Members that thousands would be listening to us—and someone did something. Could the Norfolk response force respond fast enough? Having made local investigations, I have my doubts. We never know where such an incident will happen.

The Select Committee met members of MI5 and MI6. It was all very secret, but one thing that I remember—perhaps I should not divulge it—is that Parliament, while an obvious target, would not necessarily be the place where an attack would happen. As the Home Office said this week, one cannot make assumptions about where it might happen. We must be ready for an instant response on a geographical basis to whatever the problems might be.

I have rabbited on enough about openness. The Select Committee examined the homeland security situation in the United States. We were right to say that we should not invest billions and billions of pounds in a homeland security unit, as they have in the United States, even though we have the money. Every time the Chancellor stands up, I feel so confident that money will appear for whatever is necessary. However, the arguments against such a department are not simply financial; they relate to the necessary structures, and there are relevant structures in this country. We have experience, built on history, of handling terrorist attacks and bombings. Everyone here knows that. However, the Committee asked that something be done about creating a Home Office defence research centre. Lots of people have lots of information about health, vaccines and so on, but it is spinning around in a maelstrom—it is not joined up. We feel that we need a bricks and mortar building or at least a virtual set-up of some sort, so that people could access new information about scientific discoveries, such as chemical detection mechanisms, or ways to detect powder containing the anthrax bacillus. We feel that we need some means of co-ordinating information, so we were disappointed when the Home Office said that the necessary provisions were all there and that co-ordination would kick in, just like that, if there was an incident.

At my age, however, I am quite cynical about the "we British will muddle through" philosophy. People say, "We will muddle through if something happens. It will be okay," but let us face it, the attacks that happened in Madrid were, in a sense, obvious—the effects of the bombs were centred on one geographical area and all the organisations could focus there. However, the fallout from a biological or chemical weapon could blow around. As the Committee saw at Porton Down, excellent research is being done on modelling air plumes to determine how they might, at certain times of the year and with the wind in a certain direction, move from one place to another. Such research is going on, but how do we know that it will get to all the people who are interested in the subject? Do the fire service or railway staff know about it? How would they get that information? If something happened, who would tell them, "We've got to go over there. The wind's moving in that direction, but it might move that way."? Who would co-ordinate such things?

[Dr. Gibson]

I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister saw the exercise in London, because I saw her lurking in a doorway watching. I gather that there will be a co-ordinated exercise between the US and the United Kingdom—the Home Secretary recently went to the US to talk about a joint exercise. There is nothing like a fire drill to find out which doors are propped open and who does not know where to go. We need to ensure that we have some experience of the calamity that might ensue if someone managed to release something and it started to spew out. That will at least make clear what everyone's responsibility is and how scientists can access information and feed it to the front-line staff who will have to implement procedures.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): The hon. Gentleman mentioned collaboration and co-ordination between this country and the United States. Would it not be a good idea for this country to have the same degree of collaboration with other European Union countries? Such collaboration does not exist at the moment.

Dr. Gibson: I believe that I have read and heard that there will be such co-ordination between Ministers across Europe. There is a realisation that interaction with authorities across "the pond" is only one aspect of what we need to do. Incidents can happen anywhere, and the effects on one country can spread to others as people move around. We saw that with severe acute respiratory syndrome—SARS.

One of my best experiences during our trip to the States was at the Centres for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta. What a centre! Hon. Members will remember me sitting, like someone on the bridge of the Starship Enterprise, in an amazing room. Press conferences were going on and information was coming in from every city and township in the United States. If there had been an outbreak of anthrax or some other infection, the centre would have known where it was. The operation was beautifully co-ordinated. I will always remember hearing that one of Mayor Giuliani's first reactions on seeing the planes go into the twin towers was to say suddenly, "Phone up those"—I shall not use the words he used—"at that centre in Atlanta. Those planes might have had biological and chemical weapons on them." What thinking. I doubt that anyone in this country, without training and co-ordination, would have thought like that. Although I know that Mayor Giuliani is a genius, I cannot believe that one man alone arrived at that way of dealing with things. It is more that there was a certain attitude: no one would assume that there was just one event happening, because there could be two or three associated events. When the planes hit the Pentagon and the towers, that is what he thought. Within an hour, helicopters were moving to New York and Washington to take samples and so on. That has not been publicised, but it shows how the co-ordinated approach was instilled. Getting it together can save many lives.

My final point is about recent work by the Royal College of General Practitioners with the Department of Health. In their report, mention is made of front-line GPs and staff in the primary care communities and what they would know in the event of a terrorist incident. The paper includes some very interesting stuff. It is just about to be published, and has not yet been ratified, but I doubt whether there will be major changes. The report considers the right way to handle front-line medical people and how those teams would react to chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear release. The report makes the point that GPs have never seen anthrax or many of the diseases caused by the organisms that might be used. It also picks up a point from our report, which stated:

"Unless GPs are able to give authoritative information the health service risks being overwhelmed by concerned members of the public."

Panic can be prevented, if GPs are up to it. They are trusted—I trust my GP, and I think that many people feel the same way. GPs must be brought up to date on potential terrorism, and on what to look for in people who might turn up in their surgeries on a Friday night, or whenever. The report also deals with what would happen after an event. How should the worried well be handled—people with nothing wrong with them, but who are scared? Informing and instructing people about how things should be handled would, I think, decrease the number of worried well. The royal college says that such information is important, and it is involved in work on such issues. Many other questions arise for GPs—legal questions and matters of personal protection. The matter is being taken seriously, and I welcome the interaction.

We do not need to think that we will send people into a panic. I truly believe that the more information people have, the more confidence we instil in them, and the less the terrorists will be able to get their ideas through. I know that there is a limit, but my question for my right hon. Friend the Minister is, how are we to define that limit? The only way forward is a corporate interaction between all the people who will be on the front line when the incident happens. I am far from being alone in believing that such an incident will happen in this country. Are we ready? Are we organised?

2.58 pm

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): I start by endorsing the final remarks of the Chairman of the Select Committee. The biggest lesson that we learned from our inquiry, and particularly from our visit to the United States, was the fundamental difference of approach to secure information on either side of the Atlantic. We tend to be obsessive about secrecy, and often we are secretive about the wrong things—things that do not matter that much. In the United States the culture of openness is entirely intentional, and the philosophy behind it is: the more people know, the less they will panic, and the more the aggressors will know that we are several steps ahead of them. We need a complete change of our approach to secrecy in government in this country. I can keep a secret as well as the best man, and perhaps better, because of the large military presence in my constituency. In the past 20 years I have been briefed and trusted regularly by successive Governments with a lot of information, which has helped to inform my contributions in this House and helped me to represent my constituents.

The hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) is right: our Committee's visit to the United States was remarkable, and our report is remarkable because of the depth of the information that we sought and were given. I promise that I will bore the Chamber with this point only once, but there was something special for me in the visit. Wherever we went, whether it was the White House, Fort Dietrich, Atlanta or the Lawrence Livermore national laboratory, my constituents were praised because of their work at the two establishments at Porton Down—the Health Protection Agency and the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory. I was proud of that.

Dr. Gibson: They all vote Labour.

Mr. Key: The hon. Gentleman can be sure that they will not be voting Labour at the next election.

I shall dwell on two aspects of our report. The first relates to paragraphs 180 to 182, the section is on "Planning and exercises". In it, we invite the Government to release more information to the public and to ensure that lessons learned are disseminated throughout Government. We also press for more complex, larger-scale exercises. The hon. Member for Norwich, North commented on the Home Office's extraordinary ability to engage in the incident that occurred this morning in Parliament square. While preparing for this debate, I, too, observed what happened from Portcullis House, and I was impressed. I compliment the three emergency services directly involved and the others who were involved behind the scenes. After watching for about half an hour, it became clear that the response was well organised, the personnel well trained, and the procedures and clear-up efficient. I am sure that the incident was enormously inconvenient to thousands of people throughout the capital, but there could not have been a better demonstration of the progress that has been made in this country in preparing for such incidents.

When I returned to my office, one of the first things that I did was to get on to my computer and look up London Prepared, the website established by the London emergency services. On it, I saw exactly why I was right to judge that the services had been well trained and prepared for incidents such as today's. I looked at a few more websites to see whether anything had changed since last I checked them, and I am delighted to say that a lot had changed and that they had all been updated. The terrorism pages on the Home Office website are extremely informative, as is www.ukresilience.info. The Health Protection Agency website is especially helpful: it is designed to help GPs and anyone else, including ordinary families, to understand what is going on and what they should do if they are worried or if something happens. A lot of people will be checking such websites at this time of heightened concern about terrorism. Those websites are good, but hon. Members will not be surprised to hear me say that the best one is the Wiltshire police website. It is the only website of its sort that I have seen. There are links from the Home Office, Health Protection Agency, UK Resilience and other websites to its major incident planning pages, which are a good example of what can be achieved in terms of co-ordination at a local level. I commend them strongly.

When the Minister gave evidence to the Select Committee, I asked her about some exercises that were taking place. I was delighted by the outcome of the exercise in London at Bank station, which obviously taught a lot of people a great deal, but I recalled the Minister saying that a lot of desktop exercises were taking place as well, so I checked them out. From the Health Protection Agency website pages on the emergency response division exercise programme, I learned that there have been five recent exercises. There was Red Scar I, a smallpox exercise on 24 March last year in Oxford; Exercise Shipshape, a SARS exercise on 6 June last year in Bristol; Red Scar II, another smallpox exercise on 7 July last year in Leeds; Green Goblin, a chlorine gas terrorist attack exercise on 10 October last year in Peterborough; and East Wind, a dirty bomb terrorist attack exercise on 23 January this year in Cambridge. I delved a little deeper and discovered that Green Goblin involved syndicates from the local and regional eastern and east midlands areas, and the HPA national area. The key action points that emerged from the exercise are that there should be a formal joint health advisory cell training exercise involving health training with the police; a review of major incident plans to include the CBRN element; and an identification of alternatives in the event of mobile phone and BT networks going down, and so on.

There was considerable detail, but that was only a tabletop exercise. That is the problem that we have to come to terms with. It entails changing our attitude towards secrecy, taking the British public into the Government's confidence and having full-scale exercises, such as the London exercise at Bank tube station. Such exercises should be extended to cover not just chemical threat, which is comparatively easy to deal with because it is about containment, but biological, radiological or nuclear threat. I found a contrasting example by going to the US Department of Homeland Security website and seeing the announcement on 1 March of the deployment of the national incident management system—NIMS—which went into enormous detail. We should not be surprised, given the immense resource that US Administration have put into it, that the amount of planning, preparation and detail on that website is very impressive. We in this country should move forward more swiftly in such areas. Much of that depends on training and much training has been done. The Home Office is right to have concentrated on that.

The nuclear, biological and chemical centre at Winterbourne Gunner in my constituency used to be the Army's exclusively. The site is now shared with the police NBCR centre, where many thousands of policemen and women from every constabulary in the United Kingdom have now trained. As an aside, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I was interested to discover that all journalists going in theatre where the military are active now have a briefing from the defence NBC centre at Winterbourne Gunner, which is no doubt why we saw more responsible journalism during Operation Telic than we saw a decade ago. To return to my theme, tabletop exercises are all very well, but what people are doing in Peterborough, Leeds or Cambridge might not filter through to Bristol, Plymouth or Southampton. I ask the Minister to carry out more exercises—we need more effort and expenditure in that regard.

[Mr. Key]

The second major area that I wish to explore arises from evidence given to the Committee on 2 April 2003—question 207 in particular, which was put by the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon). He asked Dr. Wright of the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry about concerns for the safety and security of sites. Dr Wright replied that there was great concern about animal rights extremists, both on site and elsewhere. That must be a concern for British industry, and for all the people who work at such sites. I dare say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you noticed an item on BBC News Online on 10 March, repeated on the media generally, about scientists' neighbours being targeted. The report said:

"Scientists are being targeted by animal rights activists the University of Nottingham says."

It described how letters were being sent to scientists' neighbours, which was placing undue pressure on those communities. We are familiar with the problem—the story of Huntingdon Life Sciences comes to mind. The day before yesterday, the Secretary of State for Health made an announcement in the House about developments in respect of variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease and blood donations. As it happens, work on blood donations has been done by scientists who also work on vaccines and the protection of military and civilian populations. To protect people, those scientists need to conduct trials on some animals. I learned only yesterday that, as a result of that work, a family in my constituency is about to be harassed by animal rights activists because the man is the owner and managing director of a very small business that provides mice. His house is to be picketed on mothering Sunday, and he and his wife will have to go, or stay and be intimidated. Such harassment is outrageous, and I do not believe that it earns anyone any friends.

What do we do about it? Is it true that there is adequate legislation to protect individual households? In the United States, there is federal and state legislation on the issue. The federal legislation, for which the reference number is HR 3448, is the Public Health Security and Bioterrorism Preparedness and Response Act 2002, section 336 of which is entitled "Animal enterprise terrorism penalties". That legislation is applicable throughout the US. I believe that, had similar legislation been applicable in this country, what happened to Huntingdon Life Sciences and the companies serving and the people working for it would not have occurred. State legislation is pending in Missouri in the form of Senate Bill No. 657 of 27 February 2003. Texas has new section 28.09 of the penal code, entitled "Animal Rights and Ecological Terrorism", which is about to be enacted. New York state has Bill A04884. There are other examples—state legislatures are taking the issue very seriously.

In this country, there has been a great deal of argument about whether it would be practical to protect civilian work forces, whether at military or civilian establishments. The Government amended the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, section 42 of which gives police the power of direction to stop the harassment of a person in his home. Section 43 deals with malicious communications—telephone calls in the middle of the night and so on—and section 44 with collective harassment. However, I spoke to the police today about the case that I described, and I learned that they are diffident about using such provisions. There is not much experience of using them, and the police are not very confident that the amendments that the Government made to that Act will work. We shall see.

Bob Spink: Does my hon. Friend think that one solution might be to extend the Protection from Harassment Act 1997? That Act protects individuals, but offers no protection to corporate bodies, so it could not be used to protect Huntingdon Life Sciences, for instance. It should have been able to be used. Such an extension would be a good way to make progress, and I believe that the industry agrees.

Mr. Key: Yes, my hon. Friend makes a very practical suggestion, for which I am grateful. However, I think that it will run up against a problem that has been identified by a number of concerned groups. Obviously, the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry is concerned, but so are the Research Defence Society, the Biosciences Federation, the trade union Amicus and others. They have been working for some time on a draft Bill, which they call the Scientific Procedures on Animals (Public Order, etc.) Bill. It is pretty wide. First, it defines harassment, which relates to the family in my constituency who will have such a horrible weekend. The Bill provides that harassment is, in certain circumstances to do with animal research, illegal and talks about how the measures would work. Clause 5 relates to the conduct of putting people in fear of violence, clause 6 is about police direction to stop the harassment of a person in his home and clause 7 relates to harassment of a person in his home. That is all entirely practical.

The Home Office argues that there would be a duplication of existing legislation, but I am not sure that that is a strong argument. There are plenty of examples of apparent duplication, such as football hooliganism legislation. It was argued for years that there was no need to bother with specific legislation because football hooliganism was already covered by public order legislation. However, that position did not stand and legislation was introduced that was effective because it was specific to the case. We need legislation, and there is no problem with duplication, because we need to facilitate the coherent approach that is sought by the police. I say "sought" because the police would do more to protect citizens if they could.

There are four arguments in favour of passing such legislation. First, it would allow organisations such as universities or companies that are regulated by the Government to be protected and for them to protect their staff. That cannot be done now under injunctions obtained under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997. Secondly, a special Act would provide the courts with powers to issue restraining orders against those with a proven track record of criminal or intimidatory behaviour. Thirdly, it would make illegal so-called home visits that have the sole intent of intimidating families. It is terribly important to prevent such behaviour, because it is contrary to article 8 in schedule 1 of the Human Rights Act 1998, which states the right to secure and peaceful private and family life. That is impossible if people are picketing one's front door on mothering Sunday. Finally, such legislation would provide a three-strikes-and-you're-out clause for repeat offenders. At the moment, activists say time and again that what they do on one occasion does not add up to a row of beans, but it sure amounts to a row of beans if all the beans are counted.

The time has come for us to grasp the nettle. A number of interested parties are talking to the Department of Health—I am thinking particularly of thousands of my constituents who work in this field, at Porton Down and elsewhere. They want to know that the Home Office is actively engaged with the issue, because if we cannot encourage scientists to undertake such work, two things will happen. First, the work will simply be done elsewhere, probably in the United States, and we will lose an important part of our science base in this country. Secondly, we will all be losers because we will be less safe. We will not be protected by our scientists in the way that our citizens should be able to expect from the Government. We should do what our citizens who are scientists and researchers—in my case, my constituents—expect us to do to protect them, for the sake of our nation's security.

3.19 pm

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): There is no doubt in my mind that the terrible acts of terrorism that occurred on 11 September 2001 in the United States of America brought home in the starkest possible fashion the threat to freedom and democracy posed by international terrorists. The devastation and carnage and the chilling disregard shown by the perpetrators for any human life, including their own, sent shock waves throughout the world, as did their willingness to slaughter thousands of innocent people without warning in the pursuit of some fanatical belief.

It should have been clear to everyone that such terrorist groups, if they acquired weapons of mass destruction, would not hesitate to use them. A major factor in my decision to support the war in Iraq was the fact that the United Nations was convinced that Saddam Hussein was developing chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear weapons programmes, and the danger that those weapons could find their way into terrorists' hands. I still think that that was the right decision. Saddam Hussein was a threat to the world, and even though weapons have not been found, I still believe that we did the right thing, because of the danger that he represented.

Bob Spink: Like me, the hon. Lady is aware that Saddam Hussein was not only thought to have those weapons, but had them and had used them. He used them at Halabja on 16 March, 16 years ago this week, and followed that with the Anfal campaign, in which 182,000 Kurds were slaughtered by chemical weapons of mass destruction. There is no grey area: we all knew that he had those weapons and that he would use them if he could, although we do not know what has happened to them and when he lost them. I congratulate the hon. Lady on having the courage to support the Prime Minister in going to war and removing that evil regime.

Geraldine Smith: I thank the hon. Gentleman. I agree with what he says. Iraq is a better place because Saddam Hussein is gone. People who think that we are threatened by terrorism because we went to war are mistaken and naïve; that threat existed before the war with Iraq, and there is no rhyme or reason governing why those fanatical people attack certain countries.

The Government and the official Opposition both recognise the threat of international terrorism and the terrible consequences that the failure to defeat that threat would have. The Prime Minister has rightly mounted a personal crusade to bring the issue to the top of the international agenda. I think that the following short extract from a recent speech that he made crystallises the extent of the threat that he perceives:

> "September 11th was for me a revelation. What had seemed inchoate came together. The point about September 11th was not its detailed planning; not its devilish execution; not even, simply, that it happened in America, on the streets of New York. All of this made it an astonishing, terrible and wicked tragedy, a barbaric murder of innocent people. But what galvanised me was that it was a declaration of war by religious fanatics who were prepared to wage that war without limit. They killed 3000. But if they could have killed 30,000 or 300,000 they would have rejoiced in it. The purpose was to cause such hatred between Moslems and the West that a religious jihad became reality; and the world engulfed by it.
> We know that the terrorists would, if they could, go further and use chemical, biological, or even nuclear weapons of mass destruction. We know, also, that there are groups of people, occasionally states, who will trade the technology and capability of such weapons. It is time that this trade was exposed, disrupted, and stamped out. We have been warned by the events of 11 September, and we should act on the warning.
> From September 11th on, I could see the threat plainly. Here were terrorists prepared to bring about Armageddon."

I firmly believe that the Prime Minister was right in his assessment of the situation. Avoiding the nightmare scenario that he describes will require international co-operation on an unprecedented scale. I have every confidence that the UK Government will do all in their power to facilitate the necessary mechanisms, measures and procedures to make that happen. It has been said that there is impressive collaboration between the UK and its allies, particularly the United States. However, co-operation within the European Union is less evident. The Government agree that there is scope for increasing co-operation within the European Union, and after the appalling atrocity that occurred in Madrid, that will no doubt be easier to achieve.

I am less confident that the Government have adequate measures and structures in place to prevent or deal with the effects of a chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear attack. MI5's considered view is that it is only a matter of time before a CBRN attack is launched on a major western city. Bearing it in mind that the United Kingdom is high on the terrorists' hate list, there must be a real prospect of one of our cities becoming a target. Despite that, the Science and Technology Committee was unable to detect any extensive effort to develop CBRN counter-measures. As a result, there has been no clear statement on what is required, and the research community has been unable to respond in a co-ordinated manner.

Homeland defence depends heavily on the input of the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory at Porton Down. Although, as hon. Members have stressed, that establishment is internationally recognised for its expertise in defence-related technologies, its main function is to support the military. A similar establishment, working in civil defence against CBRN attacks, is required. That could be achieved by the creation of a Government agency—a centre for home defence—under the auspices of the Home Office. It could have its own research budget and would be responsible for researching and deriving new technologies for home defence, as well as adapting military technologies for civil use. It would have the ability to commission research by the Department of Health and the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory, and would be responsible for identifying relevant research expertise within universities and research council institutes, as well as for forming strong links with academic and Government research laboratories overseas. I am firmly convinced that the creation of such an agency would greatly enhance the country's ability to produce effective counter-measures against a CBRN attack.

My final point relates to an issue that has already been mentioned: the unnecessary secrecy that seems to permeate the Home Office, which we saw during our Committee inquiry, and the lack of information on these matters that is made available to the public at large. I accept that there must be a balance—I was quite pleased that, after meeting the head of MI5, I knew no more about national security and secrets than I had an hour before; I felt that she was just doing her job. We sometimes have only ourselves to blame: when ex-Cabinet Ministers run to the press to talk about matters that could damage national security and the national interest, it undermines our credibility as politicians.

It is sad to say—but true—that the Committee learned more on our visit to the United States about how the Americans are dealing with some aspects of CBRN threats than we could glean from our Government about how we are dealing with such threats. When we were in America, we visited the Centres for Disease Control in Atlanta, which even lists the number and distribution of smallpox doses for vaccinations. Scientists at Lawrence Livermore national laboratory in California briefed us on their detection systems and capabilities. US officials gave our Committee unrestricted briefings, and we met representatives of the Department for Homeland Security. The US was definitely much more open with information, and is it less safe as a result? I do not think so, so impressive are the measures that the Americans are putting in place to fight terrorism. Their openness with the public is the right approach.

One of the consequences of over-zealous secrecy is that it inevitably gives rise to the suspicion that the Government are simply avoiding embarrassing questions and have a misguided view that openness will somehow panic the public. As has already been said, if we are more open and tell people what the risks are, they become more confident and less frightened. I believe that much more needs to be done to make people aware of the potential danger and how the risk can be limited. We in this country seem to be in a bizarre situation: the vast majority of Members of Parliament fully recognise the real threat that terrorists will launch a chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear attack, and how devastating the consequences would be, but it seems that a substantial proportion of the public believe that the threat is too remote to be taken seriously and that politicians are just trying to scare them. We need a much more open public discussion about all the issues surrounding the terrorist threat and what can be done to combat it. The Government must take the lead and inform the public as frankly as they are able to about the risk and the nation's state of preparedness to deal with a chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear attack.

3.31 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith). Today she showed the familiar passion and courage that this House and the country have come to expect from her, and for which she is known. I shall be echoing many of the points that she made.

I pressed the Committee to prepare the report, and I welcome the debate which is, as the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) said, most timely. There was a full-scale chemical alert around the Palace of Westminster today, when a van was in an accident involving two chemicals which, if mixed, might have produced poisonous gases. That was not, as we have already heard, a terrorist attack, but it clearly shows, as my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) explained, what can happen and what the response should be. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's remarks and I associate myself with his praise for the services that dealt with the incident. I was in the middle of it.

Our inquiry looked at how science and technology could be harnessed to develop counter-measures to chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear devices employed by terrorists, and how science and technology are informing the response to terrorism. The UK's greatest source of expertise is, of course, the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory at Porton Down. It has a military focus and no home defence remit. Therefore it is logical that the Committee should recommend the establishment of a centre for home defence, under the Home Office, to develop technologies that can be put to civilian use. Protecting civilians is as important as protecting servicemen and women.

I shall focus on the Government's overall management of the use of science and technology in home defence and their duty to make the public aware of what is going on. Our report is very relevant in the light of the Madrid bomb, as we have heard, and the escalating threat of terrorist attacks on the UK—principally London, I suspect.

The report is particularly relevant to my constituents, who feel, for two jolly good reasons, that they are in the front line of a potential terrorist attack. They were attacked by terrorists about 20 years ago. It was IRA terrorists who perpetrated an attack, with explosives, on Castle Point. The oil storage plant that they attacked is no longer in my constituency, so I stress that it is no longer a target for anyone in that respect. However, my constituents still feel under threat because thousands of them travel to London by train every day. They use the tubes and travel on the roads. They have a right to know what is going on and I have a duty to fight in this House for their best interests. That means ensuring that they know what is going on. That is why I pressed so hard for the report in the first place, as hon. Members may recall.

Let me inform the debate by giving hon. Members the result of a recent internet poll, which asked:

"Do you feel confident there are enough security measures in place to prevent an attack on London's transport system?"

Some 85 per cent. of those who answered—some will have been my constituents—said, "No." That is a very stark message for the Government, who have a clear duty to reassure the public that adequate steps are being taken. That is why it was wrong of the Department for Transport to pull out of the evidence session. It had no good reason to do so—at least, no reason has been given for its shyness.

The Home Secretary has a duty to proceed sensitively when inquiries deal with highly classified information. However, the members of the Select Committee, like members of all such Committees, are grown-up people. We understand the sensitivities and we accept that there is sometimes a need for confidentiality. We would therefore have accepted it if Ministers had told us that certain issues could not be discussed openly. However, the Government were disingenuous when they said that our inquiry's remit did not justify a detailed analysis of counter-terrorism measures. Select Committees are here to hold the Government to account and it is for us, not a control-obsessed Government, to set and interpret our remit. We do our job with total responsibility and a clear awareness of the sensitivities and the need for security.

I suspect that the Government's reasons for secrecy and non-co-operation with our inquiry had more to do with controlling information, avoiding embarrassment and a misguided belief that openness might cause panic in the population. A culture of secrecy is embedded in the Home Office, which is afraid that public scrutiny will expose the Government's lack of preparedness and incompetence in this important area. The Government are far too preoccupied with the danger of alarming the public, but that makes the public cynical and distrustful, and it lowers their confidence that adequate measures have been or are being put in place for their protection.

Constituents tell me that they want to know more. Mrs. C. F. from Thundersley contacted me just this week, saying that she did not trust the Prime Minister to tell the truth on the issue. The hon. Member for Norwich, North, who is muttering at the moment, has said that if the public are kept in the dark, "trust becomes an issue". The public are being kept in the dark and trust is an issue, which is why Mrs. C. F. of Thundersley contacted me this week, and she is not the only one.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): Would the hon. Gentleman accept that a little learning can be a dangerous thing and that people who do not have sufficient understanding might be frightened out of their wits?

Bob Spink: No one in this place or anywhere else could ever accuse the hon. Gentleman of having only a little learning. He is extremely intelligent and articulate—hence his excellent intervention, which I will answer in this way.

My constituents want some facts. They want to know what the risks are because they face them daily. They want to know what defences are in place to protect them. They want to know what chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear counter-measures can be expected in the event of an attack. They want to know what they should and can do in certain circumstances to help themselves and others who may be hurt or need assistance, and to ensure that they do everything possible to assist the security forces to prevent a crisis in the first place or to deal with one if one sadly takes place. People want to be trusted and empowered; they do not want to be nannied by a control-obsessed state.

Our health professionals and general practitioners, as the hon. Member for Norwich, North mentioned, will be unable to give authoritative advice and in a crisis the health service could easily become overwhelmed by concerned members of the public. The media would not be able and ready to feed information to the public quickly and accurately to help in the counter-terrorist battle. Such states of preparedness are long overdue and should be delivered by the Government. We are not in a state of preparedness, so our response in a crisis will be less good. The impact of any attack would therefore be greater in human and organisational terms.

As we have heard, the United States prepares itself differently. Sadly, I could not attend the United States visit because I had a constituency engagement and one's constituency comes first. It is accepted that the United States does things more openly, so it is more accountable for its actions or inactions in a crisis. That does not make it less safe; it improves the response and limits the risk. During our inquiry—although I did not attend, I followed the evidence carefully—the US Government gave us evidence, including unrestricted briefings on therapeutic counter-measures conducted by the US military. Indeed, they gave us more briefings and information than our Government would trust us with. The bottom line is that being prepared and informed makes the target smaller; being uninformed and unprepared makes the target bigger. That is why I welcome this report. As for potential terrorists, they have access to the internet and other sources of information, and have been using and training on them for many years. They have access to information of which the public would never dream. We cannot tell them anything that they do not already know or could not already find out.

I now move from the issue of secrecy to that of organisational competence. The Government are found wanting here too. The first question is: who is responsible? The Government fall at that initial fence. Our inquiry found that it is not clear who in Government is responsible for determining to what threats the UK should respond and with what priority. We have not established how risk assessments inform Government policy, nor, therefore, the scientific and intelligence response. It is our duty to highlight that shortfall. For instance, we need closer collaboration and co-ordination between the Home Office and the Department of Health. We must be clearer about where responsibilities lie, including the roles of the Health Protection Agency, the Medical Research Council, the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory at Porton Down, and other agencies and bodies such as the research councils, the military and the pharmaceutical industry, which could play a crucial role in helping to develop biomedical counter-measures. There is still much to do to co-ordinate those various disparate bodies. We must have proper co-ordinated control of the myriad agencies that are or should be involved in ensuring that science and technology are maximised in this country's defence against possible terrorist threats. We must have a single, high-level, ministerial point of responsibility, so that we have a clear point of accountability, which, pray God, will never be called to ultimate account.

Our proposed centre for home defence would be a key factor in pulling all the various players together as a single team. Its first job might be to oversee much needed research on decontamination processes and procedures. At the moment, the buck must stop with the Prime Minister, as the inquiry showed him to be wanting. I commend the all-party report and urge that action be taken to improve information flows, including to the public, and to sort out the lines of responsibility, management and overall organisation of the defence of Britain against the terrorist threat.

3.46 pm

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to see you chairing another debate involving the Select Committee on Science and Technology, Sir Nicholas. I am starting to think that you are an honorary member of the Committee.

Terrorism is undoubtedly one of the greatest threats facing the world today. Our distinguished chief scientific adviser can think of only one greater threat—climate change—as he revealed during his recent visit to the United States. Last week's events in Madrid have brought terrorism into sharp focus once again, as, regrettably, do the almost weekly events in Baghdad.

We have a new expression—asymmetric warfare. We do not know who the enemy is or how, where or from which direction they will strike. Recent events worldwide have shown that the new form of terrorist is not even prepared to give a warning to save lives. Indeed, the evidence shows that they want to cause as many deaths as possible. That is why these people are some of the most evil terrorists in recent history.

Who would have thought that anyone could even dream of flying an aeroplane fully laden with passengers into a tower block? To fly two such aeroplanes into the highest tower blocks in the world is beyond my comprehension, not to mention flying another into the Pentagon and a fourth that crashed into the ground. How many scenarios can a terrorist think of? The possibilities are endless, which is a big problem. That is why the provision of intelligence, in which science has a role to play, is critical in combating terrorism. Nosey neighbours are back in business.

I have always believed that tackling the causes of terrorism is far more important than declaring a war on terrorism, which only creates more terrorists, as we are beginning to see. In my opinion, the main causes are poverty, intolerance and social exclusion. We need to declare a war on those problems first.

We now come to the main theme of the debate. I have been concerned about building security ever since the IRA began to attack areas of Britain that have high-rise buildings or office blocks with frontages that have acres of glass in them. It appears that we do not build high-rise blocks in Britain that could collapse like a pack of cards, as the twin towers did in New York. I am, however, greatly concerned about the amount of glass in buildings that can, and usually does, fall on to people, or fly in and out and damage people, when there is a bomb blast. I am also concerned that air intakes are usually at the bottom of buildings and are unprotected, so they can be used to introduce volatile chemicals to buildings.

Science can provide the answers to these problems. We can, for example, design chemical and biological detection devices that can be placed in air intakes, or filters that will filter out certain biological agents and even chemical agents. The obvious answer, however, is to redesign buildings to make them safer—for example, by removing air intakes from areas that are open to the public. I am pleased that organisations such as the Institution of Structural Engineers have begun to take the issue very seriously indeed. The IStructE published "Safety in tall buildings and other buildings of large occupancy" in July 2002, which was a useful addition to the debate. We should ask how safe a tall building is. However, I would like to put the question another way: "How tall can a safe building really be?" We must think how many people work in the building or visit it and how many would therefore need to escape in a real emergency, be it an accident or a terrorist attack. I can find no debate in the public domain on how tall such buildings should be, no matter how costly the land in London, New York, Manchester or other major cities.

I turn to the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001. When I was a research chemist in 1965, I synthesised a new polyfluorinated compound that was impossible to handle in the department in which I worked, even using the extremely efficient new fume cupboards that had been fitted in the laboratories. That compound was so volatile and lachrymatory that within minutes of my isolating it for the first time from an ethereal solution in a fume cupboard, the whole department—a large department at Durham university—had to evacuate the building. Even in great dilution, the chemical was swept in through the air intakes and in a few minutes had filled every room in the building. That compound was of obvious interest as a potential riot control agent. I believe that its properties were drawn to the attention of the chemists working for the chemical defence establishment at Porton Down at that time—many years ago, I hasten to add.

That incident brings me on to one of the main themes of the Committee's report, which is covered in chapter 7, "Security of research". Parts 6 and 7 of the 2001 Act tighten controls on access to pathogens and toxins used in UK research laboratories. Under the 2001 Act, universities and research establishments must notify the Government if they hold dangerous substances and provide information to the police if requested. Would my new compound have counted as one of those? Is there a list of such toxins? The answer is that the 2001 Act would not have applied to my new compound.

There is a list of biological agents for export control. In fact there are two lists and therein lies another problem. The chemicals on the best-known list, the so-called Australia group list, which is in schedule 5 of the 2001 Act, are not like mine. They are highly toxic chemicals, such as ricin, that are entirely natural products, not synthetic chemicals. The other materials in the Australia group list are viruses, rickettsiae, and bacteria. We are also told that counter-terrorism officers are drawing up a second list, the so-called Salisbury list, which seems to have a different categorisation from the Australia group list. I am told that the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) is in no way connected with the Salisbury list.

Clearly, there is some confusion on the Committee about the two lists. The Australia group list is current in the 2001 Act, so that is the legal requirement. The public are not allowed to be told much about the Salisbury list, although we understand that it has been widely distributed among university health and safety officers. Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Minister will clear up the confusion over the two lists and tell us why the Government seemed to be so secretive with the Committee about the content of the Salisbury list. It would seem that toxic chemicals other than natural products should be on the Salisbury list. The Australia group list contains none of those, not even organophosphates—nerve agents, such as sarin, which terrorists used on the Tokyo underground.

Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Minister can also tell us why scientists are still waiting for the Government to set a minimum standard of compliance with the 2001 Act. She told our Committee that that would happen by the end of next August. Perhaps she can tell us today whether the target will be met.

There is a need for greater awareness in the academic community of the contents and implications of the 2001 Act. What are the Government doing to encourage universities and others to comply? I note that the Government's response to our report, published on 22 January, agrees:

"The present situation in relation to the Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act is unsatisfactory".

Next, let us turn to the thorny problem of vetting students and researchers. In the 1960s, the university of Salford, where I worked, had one of the best laboratories of any country in Europe for handling low and high-level radioactive chemicals that emitted all the potentially dangerous radiations: alpha-rays, beta-rays, gamma-rays and x-rays. People came from all over the world to be taught nuclear science in the Cockcroft building, and a large contingent of both undergraduate and postgraduate students came from, and returned to, Iraq. Need I say more?

We cannot predict a terrorist threat today that might be several decades away. Genetics is a red-hot research topic. However, who knows what threats will be possible tomorrow from knowledge gained today? Nevertheless, a voluntary vetting scheme was set up in 1994 to assist the Government in preventing the transfer of risky technology abroad. Currently, the scheme covers 10 countries of concern and 21 academic disciplines of concern. Where a postgraduate research application from a country of concern coincides with an academic discipline of concern, the advice is that the application should be referred to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. I repeat that the scheme is voluntary.

Evidence gathered during our investigation suggested that not all universities are taking the voluntary scheme as seriously as they perhaps should, especially in the current climate. The obvious conclusion is that if they do not start to comply and to take the voluntary scheme seriously soon, it will be replaced by something more rigorous, which might restrict their academic freedom more than at present. When we visited the United States of America, we were told that things are much more difficult there regarding the entry of students from abroad, who appear to be rigorously vetted. The long delays in granting visas are now causing serious problems for research programmes. Even travel to a conference abroad, followed by re-entry, poses severe difficulties.

Concerns that scientists could undertake unethical research have led to a proposal that they should take an oath analogous to the Hippocratic oath taken by medical doctors. The Pugwash conferences on science and world affairs have proposed such an oath, which can be found on page 63 of our report. The International Committee of the Red Cross has called on scientific and medical associations and industry:

"To adopt professional and industrial codes of conduct aimed at preventing the abuse of biological agents".

Many learned societies have already introduced such codes of conduct for their members and we have recommended that all learned societies should consider introducing "an overt ethical code of conduct as a prerequisite of membership".

However, it is not essential for all scientists to belong to a learned society.

Concerns have also been expressed about the publication of research papers that might contain information of great interest to terrorists. In January 2003 a statement on such publications was issued by a journal editors' group on scientific publishing and security that featured mainly north American publications, although The Lancet and Nature were also involved. We recommend in the report that the science Minister raise the issue in the European Union.

The Scott inquiry resulted in the Export Control Act 2002, which controls the export of military and dual use goods. It is essential that the Government do not use that Act to prevent the interchange of scientific samples between countries. We heard that scientists in the United States of America are finding it more difficult to exchange samples with scientists in other countries, including Britain.

In conclusion, a clampdown on security could make life much more difficult for British scientists and inhibit the usual academic freedoms across the world. Science has always relied on a free exchange of information, and people in different countries also freely exchange their roles. We urge our Government to take that into account when planning new legislation or enforcing existing legislation. We also call on scientists throughout the world to behave responsibly. There is a fine balance to be struck between the need for tight security and freedom in the academic community, which I hope will always lie in the latter direction rather than the former. Whatever we do, we must use all the endeavours of the scientists and all the available scientific techniques to minimise the risk of a terrorist attack.

4.1 pm

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon), who is learned in this subject—he always brings a tremendous expertise to our deliberations—and my fellow Committee members. One thing that I hope will come out of the debate is a strong sense that, in its ranks, Parliament has people who can make an important contribution to public understanding and the promotion of scientific matters.

Our Committee exists partly to act as a voice for science and engineering and their cognate disciplines, and to ensure that the numbers of scientists available to our country and the conditions under which they work are understood and protected. It also exists to check whether the understanding of science and technology in Government is sufficiently well developed. The premise is that science and engineering can make enormous contributions to the public good, not only for our generation and its successor, but into the distant future for generations yet unborn. Science contributes something to our culture that is ineluctably part of what it is to live in a civilised society.

I want to focus not on our report's virtues—although, like other Committee members, I am extremely proud of our work—but on its deficiencies. In the report, we have tried to change some things about the culture of our country, but so far we feel that we have failed. We have failed because, as Karl Popper was wont to emphasise throughout his academic life, science is characterised by its openness and spirit of rationality. There is a spirit of people making claims that are open to challenge by others and, in the light of those challenges, sometimes rescinding or modifying those claims and making them more resilient to empirical investigation.

Science is a model of how one might conduct oneself if one was trying to be attentive to the voices of others. In that respect, it is very different from the approach of terrorists, who are entirely and insanely deaf to the pleas, arguments and world views of other people. They are deaf even to the right of others to continue living their lives. At its best, science can show us how human rationality and the desire to improve life can be one of the attributes of which a civilised society is most proud. However, some people in this world learn the techniques, understand the technology and study science with a view not to improving the lot of humankind, but to promoting their own ideology, at whatever cost to other members of the human species.

We must ensure that we have the capacity to rebut the escalating expertise of terrorists. The hon. Members for Castle Point (Bob Spink) and for Salisbury (Mr. Key) made good points with regard to the increasing capacity of terrorists to understand scientific techniques and technology and to devise nefarious methods for the destruction of people who do not share their ideology. We need a counter-culture to give people the knowledge to rebut the arguments of terrorists. Knowledge is power and ignorance is not only powerlessness, but a source of fear. Terror is fear at its worst and we do people no favours if we pretend that voices that seek to understand these things should be silenced. That is what happened with the report and that is why it is, in many ways, defective.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith) made the powerful point that we have ended up knowing more about how Americans understand and deal with these matters than ever we found out about how the United Kingdom does so. We know more about American preparedness to tackle terror than about the UK's preparedness so to do. I put it to the Minister and the Government that that cannot be right.

Let us consider just one example. The American Association for the Advancement of Science published an excellent book on the preparations that were being made to deal with terror. One chapter dealt with the water supply. The problem with the UK is that if one starts to talk about anything in detail, the response of the Government and of Government agencies is almost to say, "No, we mustn't discuss that any more: we'll give the terrorists ideas." I think that they have ideas enough, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East was sharp enough to point out. Terrorists have ideas. They have thought about water, electricity and the very air that we breathe. It is up to us to stop pretending that as long as we are silent, ignorant and pretend not to take cognisance of these matters, somehow we will be safer—we will not be safer.

In the chapter that I mentioned, the American association considered the water supply and where it was vulnerable. It is very interested in the public understanding of that. If, for instance, an average member of the American public saw someone behaving in a suspicious way near an aquifer it is very likely that they would report it to the authorities with a view to having the behaviour investigated. At least, there is far more chance of that happening in America than here, because the Americans have tried to make their population aware of points of vulnerability, whereas we have not done so to anything like the same extent.

What can be done with water? The public in Britain, who on the whole are shielded, protected, or insulated from any of the matters in question, might well have a feeling of terror at the very thought that the water supply could be interfered with. After all, if it takes, say, 1 g of cyanide to kill a person, a tonne introduced to the water supply looks capable of killing 1 million. That is the thought, at least, that people who are scientifically uneducated might have. However, it brings to light immediately one of the issues that we have tried to understand. What I said about cyanide just now is of course a scientific non sequitur. It is true that cyanide is a terrible substance and that it could wreak great havoc and fear if substantial quantities were available to people as malevolent as the Madrid bombers. However, cyanide in the water supply reacts with the residual chlorine to produce potassium chloride, which, when suitably diluted, is relatively innocuous.

It does not follow, as the Americans point out, that because someone wants to poison people, vast quantities of poison in the water supply will do the trick. Chlorine itself would be a far more potent poison than potassium chloride, particularly in the quantities in which chlorine is available with respect to much of its industrial use.

Dr. Iddon: I am impressed by my hon. Friend's knowledge of chemistry, but I hope that he will agree with me on one point that has not emerged in the debate—that all over the world, now, people are monitoring the production, transport, export and import of chemicals. That does not happen only with respect to the production of illicit drugs. While I have not heard this, I am sure that monitoring is also taking place of chemicals that could be used by terrorists. It is now, fortunately, very difficult to get hold of some chemicals.

Mr. McWalter: I agree strongly with my hon. Friend, but it is interesting that chemicals that are produced in very large quantities, for very large-scale industrial processes, are sometimes those about which we need to be most wary.

An interesting aspect of the Americans' work on water supply is how the monitoring of water quality is developing. Not only is the focus on so-called naturally occurring pollutants—clearly, some nitrates and other pollutants are introduced through agriculture—but an attempt is being made to monitor water for much rarer components. The Americans are moving towards filtering out impurities that it would, in the normal course of events, be surprising to find in the water system.

The American Government approach is to have an open debate, to admit that there is a threat, to admit to vulnerabilities and to seek to engage the public where they can help. They want to let the public own the problem, rather than to say, "Oh, no. We are not going to let you own the problem. We are going to take it to some ultra secret hole in the ground and we will solve all the problems for you. There's nothing to worry about."

The Committee thinks that there are things to worry about, not least because the Committee is getting quite good at sometimes identifying where there is a scientific deficiency within Government. There was an amusing example of that only this Monday. One of the leaders of the research councils told us that they would engage the Government in discussion if only they could find someone sensible to talk to. He was not referring to the Home Office, I hasten to add.

The Committee has the capability. We are not front-line scientists, but we are experienced enough and have seen enough to understand when someone is trying to pull the wool over our eyes. At the Committee sitting dealing with water we asked the United Kingdom representatives about these problems and read them chapter and verse from the Americans, but they said, "We disagree." That was that. There was no argument. There was no discussion. There was no depth. In place of rational argument and an open sharing of concerns and understanding there was a complete clam. That is what is wrong with our report. Despite strenuous efforts, particularly by our ever-resilient Chairman, we were unable to break the mould of that way of thinking.

We are glad that the Home Office now has a chief scientist—we have been pressing for that—but I am slightly worried that the efforts of the Committee to get more scientists into government might be curtailed by things that were said in the Budget debate yesterday. If one is trying to get more expertise into government, the best way to go about it might not be to have large-scale redundancies in Departments that often seem to lack understanding of fundamental science.

I believe that our report is one of which we can all be proud. We are also all proud of our debate today. It has the capacity to change the culture of government so that the Government are more responsive to science and more willing to give credence to scientific expertise held outside government and outside Oxford and Cambridge. If the Government persist in thinking that this is a problem that the public need not own, we will all regret it. The Metropolitan Police Commissioner was quite right when he said that we would have to deal with this in the end.

The Committee has sought to make the public more aware of the scale of the threats and then to equip them to understand how to work through the traumatic events that the terrorists would visit upon us. I hope that the Minister will announce today that the Home Office is more willing to share with us its view of these problems and that from today's debate will come a sense that not only the public, but the Committee, are being asked to share the problem.

4.19 pm

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): It is a pleasure to be the first non-member of the Committee to speak. I have found this afternoon's debate fascinating, particularly the obvious unanimity of views of Committee members about the value of the report. They are perhaps more unified on that than they are on the war with Iraq and how to deal with terrorism. The report has brought them all together and made a useful contribution to the debate on how to respond to the threat of terrorism. The hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) and I have considered that in relation to the Civil Contingencies Bill. We examined the planning for such incidents in the abstract, whereas the Committee considered the specifics of how responses can be most effective.

Following on from what was said by the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter), I find it curious that we are bringing together the most rational and humane of disciplines—scientific disciplines—with the most irrational and inhumane actions, which are those of terrorists. To bring the two together is a helpful way of reminding us that in dealing with the terrorism threat we must continue to act rationally. The terrorism threat is designed to make us act in irrational ways—in other words, to break down our sense of humane and civilised behaviour. Throughout the period that we are under such a threat, it is important that we continue to behave rationally, and science, in a sense, is the apogée of our rational behaviour.

The report can help us in two respects. First, it discusses the technology that we need to respond to specific threats posed by terrorism. Secondly, it promotes the scientific discipline of evaluating risk properly to decide on the appropriate response. The technological responses are comprehensively covered in the report and I hope that the material collected there will form a useful benchmark for the Government's planning. As a layman I found it helpful. I am a technologist but not a scientist, and I recognise the difference between the two, but I found the report helpful in explaining some scientific issues engendered, in particular, by trying to respond to potential chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear attacks on the United Kingdom. It is a very helpful document from that point of view.

I detected a certain amount of needle between the Government and the Committee over the report, which comes out in the Government's response. It starts by saying how wonderful the report is and that many of the recommendations are to be accepted, but goes on to say that they cannot accept some recommendations and completely to reject others. Clearly, there was some needle, but I hope that in terms of the substance of the report, as parliamentarians will appreciate, fences are being mended between the Government and the Committee and will continue to be mended with the help of the Minister's response this afternoon.

I found two areas useful when looking at the technological response, which relates to the applied science that must be brought into play to combat the terrorist threat. The first is the question whether research is too defence focused, as was set out in recommendation 6 of the report and to which the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) referred in his introduction. There are associated recommendations, such as recommendation 54 on a centre for home defence. I hope that that issue will be followed up effectively, as the Committee is on to something there.

In the past, the focus of research was naturally on the threats imagined then, which were CBRN threats to military personnel in the field, or a nuclear catastrophe involving the protect and survive response that we would have had in the cold war, when there could have been massive nuclear attacks on cities throughout the United Kingdom. Neither scenario particularly applies these days and there seems to be significant scope for remodelling at least some ways that we might respond to attacks, given the expectation that they would take a completely different form.

In particular, I am considering the science of behaviour when dealing with the civilian population in the situations that we are thinking of, such as attacks on cities and transport networks. The responses might be quite different from those in a military situation. I support the Committee's recommendation in that regard.

Geraldine Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman think that if the general public were to see the Government setting up a home defence agency, they would realise that the Government were taking the threat seriously? Although the public hear the Prime Minister saying that the fight against terrorism is a priority, they do not see any back-up. That needs to happen to make the general public realise how serious the situation is.

Mr. Allan: The hon. Lady makes a good point. She makes me think of the Centre for Disease Control, which a number of hon. Members mentioned that they saw when they went to the United States. Such a visible presence is important for reassurance. The public are reassured by being shown a group of people with shiny machines who clearly know what they are doing. At present, we will not get such reassurance from the military facilities, which are, by definition, secretive. However, it would be useful if there were civilian equivalents that could be seen by the public—the equivalent of the Royal Automobile Club control centres that people see in another area of their lives—so people knew the far more significant threat to life and limb was being addressed. I agree with the hon. Lady that there is scope for that.

The question of the scientific expertise in the Home Office was raised in recommendation 7. I found echoes in that of the work that I do on information technology, as that relates to the Home Office. The Home Office seems to be a little light—to use a suitably delicate word—on the necessary expertise when dealing with scientific and technological matters. There is a genuine fear that joined-up government is not operating as effectively as it should on scientific and technical issues, including information technology. The Department of Trade and Industry is the lead Department in those areas and it has far more technical expertise, but frequently the Home Office is the operational Department that introduces legislation. If the Home Office is the lead Department in responding to attacks, it is important to beef up its scientific resources. We must overcome the sense that if the matter is scientific it is for the DTI and the Home Office is not going to employ scientists because the DTI already does so. We must ensure that the rhetoric of joined-up government works in that important context.

The other area to which science can make a major contribution is in the evaluation of risk. I noticed that there was a bit of a spat in the Government's response about defining risk versus threat. The Committee was using risk in a scientific sense, meaning the overall risk of something unpleasant happening, as one would use risk in the context of the measles, mumps and rubella vaccine and a measles outbreak. The Government responded rather petulantly by saying that they were talking about something else—that threat analysis and risk analysis are different. I believe that the Committee was correct to talk about the need to weigh up risk in terms of lost benefits as against the potential overall threat—both the likelihood of something happening, which is necessarily based on intelligence, and the severity of any incident. I recognise that those two need to be considered together.

That matter is particularly relevant in the context of the debate and was mentioned by the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) in relation to research and research directions. One could take a precautionary approach in which all forms of research that are potentially dangerous are shut down and there is no engagement with scientists from any countries that are potentially dangerous. There is a risk in continuing to engage in research in certain subject areas and with people from certain countries, but that risk must be evaluated against the potential benefits or disbenefits of ceasing to do so.

The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East mentioned Iraqi scientists in the UK in the 1960s. We do not know whether the scientists whom he met at Salford were so impressed by the way of life in the UK that they gained a code of ethics that diverted them from engaging in any programmes that we would find offensive. If we had shut the doors, they would not have had that opportunity, nor that exposure. It is a complex picture, but I believe that the Committee is right to argue against responding simply by shutting things down. We must be sensitive to the complexity of the situation and maintain a delicate balance.

As an MP who represents a constituency in which there are two active universities—Sheffield and Sheffield Hallam—I know that scientists from all over the world make enormous contributions to those universities and return to their countries as ambassadors for the UK. Those interactions continue over many years and the idea that we should shut down such exchanges carries significant risks in itself.

Dr. Gibson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is incongruous that, as a consequence of the top-up fees issue, we will have to recruit more students from abroad to get the money into higher education?

Mr. Allan: I am not sure, but I get the sense that the Committee may be more united on tuition fees than perhaps they were on Iraq. Was not the Committee away on a visit during the last vote on the Higher Education Bill? Were not Committee members encouraged to stay on that visit by the powers that be, because they might have tipped the balance the wrong way if they had returned? I am entirely at one with the hon. Gentleman on tuition fees, which are a serious issue for universities.

One thrust of Government policy seems to be that universities should act more like businesses in a global economy—that they should go out and sell themselves and bring people in. If we are to do that, we must recognise the full consequences of it. We cannot do it and then say to them, "Ah, but, we're going to make life difficult for you when you try to do that."

The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East spoke about vetting. I hope that voluntary vetting can mature so that universities may properly go about their business. Export controls are not too restrictive and voluntary vetting works and is better than trying to shut things down, perhaps without thinking of the knock-on consequences.

Mr. McWalter: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has returned to his theme of shutting things down. Does he agree that it is more dangerous to shut things down than to continue to develop the expertise that our universities and other institutions can give us, so that we can deal with these matters as effectively as possible?

Mr. Allan: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. We require research to deal with threats, so research cuts both ways. I was interested in the point that the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East made about expecting people to sign up to the ethical code and about the Pugwash conferences. We have similar debates in the IT field about science and technology being primarily for the benefit of humankind: it has no purpose outside that. By and large, the people who work in science and technology subscribe to the idea that their work is intended to benefit humankind. Sadly, there is sometimes a public perception that scientists and technologists are trying to create Frankenstein's monster and to get us all. That is not the case. I have certainly never found it to be true in my experience of working with scientists in Sheffield. I am sure that other hon. Members wholeheartedly agree with that.

It is important that we are clear about the fact that allowing scientists the freedom to work will allow them the freedom to advance humankind, including by finding solutions to problems that we face. For example, some solutions to finding intelligence on potential terrorists and dealing with them are technological, but they will not be found if technologists are not allowed to advance.

I was interested in the comments about openness. There was a clear clash for the Government over which approaches should and should not be taken. I shall not intrude into anyone's private grief, because there is plenty in the report and the Government response about the different attitudes on this issue. I am also aware of the Liaison Committee debate and can testify to the fact that the Chairman batted as firmly as he could—I do not know whether I should use a cricketing metaphor with this Chairman. He tried to punt the ball into the goal as accurately as he could on behalf of the Committee.

Dr. Gibson: On the head.

Mr. Allan: Indeed, and he took it on his head. He did a robust job and was widely praised by people across the House who want Select Committees to have the freedom to act on behalf of Parliament and not be muzzled by the Executive. That is an ongoing tension, which will always be there. However, I thought it important that the Committee stuck to its guns on that occasion.

Several hon. Members spoke about creating a full picture for the public. The hon. Member for Norwich, North started by talking about the more open culture in the US and then various other hon. Members spoke to that subject. I believe that the phrase that the Government have been using in the context of terrorist alerts is, "Be alert and not alarmed." We could add "be informed" to that. The tone of the report is that we should be alert and informed.

We particularly need to be informed about risk and understanding risk, perhaps in the sense that it was meant in the report. That is part of a much wider scientific debate with which we are all struggling, not least members of the Committee. We must try to get people to understand risk—for example, by understanding that devastating attacks of the kind that sadly occurred in Madrid, for which conventional bombs were used, are the most likely scenario. We are trying to evaluate the type of threat that we are most likely to face. The threat of an attack using chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear weapons is less likely, but such an attack would be more devastating if it should take place. People must understand that; they should not focus on CBRN attacks to the exclusion of conventional bombs just because the former have more devastating consequences than the latter. People must understand that the threat is about the likelihood and the consequences of an outrage happening, dealing with the outcome and reducing casualties.

Dr. Gibson: I am tempted to say something about the intricacy of the bombs in Madrid. Using a mobile phone was an intricate means of exploding the bombs. The people who exploded them had done some training, so it would be as easy for them to learn how to use biological weapons as well. We must not underestimate the act. As horrific as it was, it was quite a complicated technological feat.

Mr. Allan: That brings us back to the points made about access to materials. The bombs that exploded in Madrid were triggered by mobile phone and the type of electronic equipment that allows remote triggering of devices by mobile phone is available in Maplin. One can buy circuit boards there that allow one to switch on lights at home. Clearly it is more complicated to set up a bomb, but the technology that turns a mobile phone ring tone into an electronic impulse that triggers an action is widely available for various legitimate purposes. There are questions about access to the materials required for CBRN attacks, because they are not so readily available.

My understanding of the Madrid attacks is that they were a combination of readily available electronics with—if they were the materials mentioned originally—explosive material stolen from French quarry sources. It was material that can be stolen from a variety of places, put together with technology that is widely available. With CBRN attacks, if we effectively shut off access to the materials, they will not be so readily available. I defer to scientists on this, but it would be quite a delicate job to create the delivery mechanisms with the infective purposes required. That suggests that if people are really serious about causing damage, they can mount conventional explosive attacks on a regular basis, as the IRA showed over a long period. They might have the capability of mounting CBRN attacks, but they would require a more extensive lead-in period.

Dr. Gibson: Five people died due to the anthrax envelope delivery system in the States, so it is not too difficult to get enough of it around by simple methods. If it is posted and somebody opens it, it goes into people's nasal tubes and they die.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the hon. Gentleman to respond to that intervention, I must say that I want to give the Minister proper time to reply to this important debate, and the Opposition spokesman has yet to speak.

Mr. Allan: I am grateful for that reminder. We could continue this technical debate over a cup of tea or a beer later.

A lot of information about the specific likelihood of an attack at any place at any time is necessarily covered by the secrecy that the security services require, but there should be an understanding of the relative impacts of different types of attack and the complexities of people being able or likely to mount such attacks. Those are scientific issues that should be widely disseminated: people should be able to gain such information from open sources. I hope that we can work towards better information sources for the public and I congratulate the Committee on its contribution to that aim.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): It is a pleasure to speak opposite the Minister again, whom I wish well.

If one is a terrorist, it has been a fantastic fortnight: an extraordinarily well-co-ordinated operation took place in Iraq on the celebration of the day of Ashura, which was co-ordinated with simultaneous operations in Pakistan and failed operations in Afghanistan. They were followed by further operations in Iraq, particularly in Baghdad. Then, this time last week, we saw the shocking events in Madrid, which have been followed by more attacks in Pakistan and last night's hideous attack with a large bomb in Baghdad.

I am surprised that neither the Liberal Democrat spokesman—the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan)—nor the Chairman of the Select Committee referred in their exchanges to events in the United Kingdom last February. I do not want to be drawn into precisely what happened, but last February we believed, correctly or incorrectly, that this country had suffered a chemical or biological attack. It was thought—it may have been proved untrue and I believe that some details are sub judice—that ricin had been deployed in north London by associates of Ansar al-Islam, which is a branch of al-Qaeda. I shall not elaborate.

The report could not be more apposite. Not only have hundreds of people been killed in the past fortnight by bog standard terrorism, if I can call it that, but this country's experience so far at the hands of Islamic fundamentalist terrorists has been of the CBRN variety, at least within these shores. I am therefore particularly grateful to the hon. Members for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) and for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) for making the scientific elements of the debate so very clear. They pointed out that the responsiveness of science is clearly a responsibility not only for the terrorist, but for the Government. People who believe that science is a black art or something that can be sneered at, as my arts-inclined 12-year-old son tends to think at the moment, are quite wrong. Science can be the friend and ally of the terrorist, but it must be the friend and ally of western liberal democracy.

The Liberal Democrat spokesman mentioned that he and I sat on the Committee that considered the Civil Contingencies Bill. Frankly, that was a mixed pleasure. However, the Select Committee's report very clearly plugs the gap in the inadequacies that he and I described so many times. The hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith) and the Chairman of the Committee made the whole issue of openness so very clear—if that is not tautology. A point made all the time during proceedings on the Bill was that the Government are not prepared to tell us what is going on. In a narrow sense, the Select Committee has made the openness of information and of witnesses more likely.

I want the Minister to take note of my fervent belief that we must be told what the threat is if we are going to be able to counter terrorist threats in general and the CBRN threat in particular. Our population must be treated like adults and must be handled responsibly. I wholly disagree with the Government's approach that it is better not to panic people, and it is clear that several hon. Members here today agree with me.

People will continue to be ignorant and horrified unless they know that they are likely to be attacked with explosives and fire, or chemical, biological or nuclear weapons. The reality is horrifying, but a little knowledge goes a tremendously long way. The Government seem to be saying that keeping knowledge to themselves will prevent panic. I say that knowledge dispels fear.

Several hon. Members, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink), made the point that we need to be trained. As well as being told what is going on, the population need to be trained in how to handle the effects of such attacks. The hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale referred to a centre for home defence. I would strongly support the creation of such a centre, which could inform training and ensure that people do not simply react to a terrorist incident in the way that they have been trained to react to, say, a fire. Clearly, reacting to a fire involves getting out of the building, moving to a concentration point and listening to further orders. Reacting to a contamination attack involves precisely the opposite: people must stay in one place and be dealt with by the authorities. The issue of training the public is therefore crucial.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) raised a similar issue. I must declare an interest because I spent many weeks in his constituency being trained in what we used to call nuclear, biological and chemical warfare skills—although with me it was more a case of a lack of skills. I pay tribute to Porton Down, where even a dunderhead such as me began to understand the intricacies of NBC—or what we might now call CBRN—warfare.

My hon. Friend said that the agencies' training exercises must go, but I strongly disagree. We have had only one field training exercise, or FTX, so far, but it was not a success and went nowhere like as far as it should have. All it did was point out the deficiencies in the training of our blue-light and emergency services. I do not mean to be rude about those services or to undermine their confidence, but table-top exercises or, to use the military terminology, CPXs—command post exercises—are not good enough. We must have more live exercises if we are to understand the threat and how to deal with chemical, nuclear and biological contamination. That could not have been made clearer than in the comments of the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East, who described the gamut of scientific threats. We can learn how to overcome such threats only through constant practice and constant exercises. Sadly, that will involve a cost, and the public must accept that, although we went through something similar before the second world war and during the cold war.

Several hon. Members referred to the extraordinarily sensible idea of a centre for home defence. The Chairman of the Committee said that someone or something needs to draw the different agencies together and to act as a focal point. Someone has to be able to take control not only of research and analysis, which lead to conclusions, but of what physically happens when an event occurs. I can conclude only that many hon. Members in the Chamber would agree with me that we need a Minister for homeland security. It would not be the first time that we have had such a Minister. Indeed, we have had a Minister of Home Security. Probably the most famous was that well-known socialist, Herbert Morrison, and it is a great pleasure for me to follow in a socialist's footsteps.

Many points have been made about the issues before us, particularly during consideration of the Civil Contingencies Bill, and I would ask the Minister to consider most carefully an issue that has been touched on this afternoon. Our blue-light, emergency and military services will have to be thoroughly trained to deal with CBRN/NBC attacks. Is there, however, a national pool of volunteers, whose training—they may have been soldiers, sailors, airmen, policemen or scientists or have worked in the nuclear industry—is such that we would absolutely want to call them forward to deal with such events? It is interesting that David Veness, an assistant commissioner of the Metropolitan police, is talking about a gentlemen's agreement with the private security industry. Under such an arrangement, workers in the industry with past CBRN or NBC experience would be asked to volunteer to provide the muscle and the work force for disasters of the sort that we have discussed today. The Minister is aware that I have been peddling such a scheme for many months. I am sorry to bore her, but I would be interested to hear a response to that proposal. An emergency volunteer reserve could not only be useful, but provide a helpful focus for other volunteer work—next year is the year of the volunteer—and be remarkably cost-effective.

The Committee has produced a terribly useful report. It is slightly frightening and it shows differences between the Committee and the Government, but that is why we are here. We are here not to score party political points, but to seek things that are for the good of the nation. I very much hope that the Government will not only consider the points that the Committee has made, but implement them.

4.51 pm

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): May I repeat the comments made by others and say that it is a great pleasure to see you in the Chair, Sir Nicholas?

I thank the Committee, personally and on behalf of the Government, for producing the report. I am particularly glad to have heard such fine contributions from all parts of the Chamber today. The Committee's evident commitment to the issue is visible and powerful. Clearly, the Government take the threat from terrorism very seriously indeed, as I am sure do Members from across the House.

Protecting the public and our national security is probably our most important duty. Recent international terrorist attacks have presented the UK and our allies with new challenges, as we have seen in the past week. We have realigned our counter-terrorism programme to try to ensure that we are ready to respond to that new, evolving threat that we have faced since

[Beverley Hughes]

11 September 2001. The threat has new dimensions and, as it has manifested itself, it has not remained static. The nature of the threat and our understanding of it evolve all the time.

Today's debate focuses on one aspect of the Government's programme—the scientific response. Delivering the counter-terrorism programme involves more than just science; it involves equipment, guidance, procedures, training—which the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) mentioned—intelligence, legislation, law enforcement and other matters. Nevertheless, science is crucial to development in those areas and often underpins it. Science adds value to the four main strands of our overall strategy: prevention, pursuit and detection of terrorists, protection and preparation to withstand the effects of any attacks.

By way of a slight digression, listening to my hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) and for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) talk about the detail of science took me back a few years. Although I made a fairly quick transition after higher education from dealing with substances to dealing with people, I, too, did a science degree. When my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead reminded us of Popper, my mind leapt without any effort to Thomas Kuhn and the other philosophers. They showed us not only that scientific research and the substance of scientific findings are important for so many areas in life, particularly counter-terrorism, but that the paradigm of science—the principles, the philosophy and the methodology—gives us some very strong frameworks within which to approach such a complex subject.

I recognise that that is the case, and key to our response to terrorism has been a commitment to harnessing the best science and technology available. Whether or not people think that the Government have done enough soon enough, we are very well placed to deliver on that commitment, because the science base at our disposal is second to none in the world. The facilities and expertise on which we draw—be that within Government or through academia, industry or links with international allies—are world class. That makes it even more important that we do everything we can to utilise to the full the potential that such facilities and expertise give us.

The Committee's inquiry was extremely valuable. It has enabled us to take stock of how we co-ordinate the scientific response to terrorism and to identify ways of doing that better. Picking up on the comments of the Chairman of the Committee, I do not believe that it was out of order for the Committee to examine that issue. Indeed, I welcome the focus that the inquiry has given to the important role that science and technology play in our counter-terrorism and broader capability programmes.

The challenge of co-ordinating the scientific response to terrorism is clear. We must seek out the best scientific expertise and apply it as effectively as possible to every part of the Government's counter-terrorism programme. I welcome the Committee's endorsement of our long-held view that there is no need for a department of homeland security based on the US model. I shall say more about that later when we talk about the proposal for a centre for home defence.

We are all trying to achieve the same objective, in that we recognise that to make progress on a very complex issue in which many strands of activity need to be brought together if we are to have an effective counter-terrorism strategy, the key is how we bring those issues together. At different ends of the spectrum are the arguments that we must have everything in one place, and that we cannot have everything in one place and must have strong and effective co-ordination mechanisms.

Leaving aside science and technology as a specific issue, if we are to develop an effective counter-terrorism response, we cannot simply have a split between the scientific expertise and capability that a Department might need to deal with a disaster, and the capability that it needs to respond to a terrorist event. For example, the Department of Health must be able to ensure that it and its satellite agencies can deal with mass fatalities or casualties however they are caused. Placing all the scientific expertise in a centre for home defence would mean that we had to replicate it in the parent Department to enable it to respond to non-terrorist incidents.

Dr. Gibson: With regard to yesterday's speech by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is interesting to note that one great success story in the cancer field involves the National Cancer Research Institute, which is becoming a paradigm for dealing with mental health issues and other issues. The institute is not made of red bricks; it is a virtual centre where people such as those from the Department of Health and charities can meet. The centre has been recognised as a good unit to take forward clinical trials in respect of cancer and so on. It is a model for other centres. The Committee is saying that we need something like that centre—even a virtual centre would do—where people are brought together regularly. The excitement and enthusiasm generated by people working together and getting together a strategy base on cancer and on how to handle the services meant that the establishment of the institute in 2000 was a major step forward.

Beverley Hughes: I thank my hon. Friend for that observation. As for the concept of a centre for home defence and virtual centres, I am not quite sure how different such an approach would be from what we are doing, which is establishing a cross-government and cross-discipline methodology.

The purpose of the methodology is to benchmark what we have and audit it, and to identify the gaps, the priorities and finally the action necessary to fill the priority gaps, and to have a mechanism to ensure that we do those things within the time scales that we envisage. In a sense, that could be a concept of a virtual arrangement that ensures that what we both want to achieve—the development of the necessary scientific expertise and making sure that it is readily available—happens.

To meet the challenge of effective scientific co-ordination we need to do three things. First, we need to make the best use of the available sources of scientific expertise within Government. Secondly, we need to build up scientific resources in key areas. Thirdly, we need to ensure that we make the most of the knowledge base and capabilities outside Government, especially in industry, in academia and among our international allies.

The first part of meeting the challenge is to look at what we have and to use it effectively. The Defence Science and Technology Laboratory and the police scientific development branch, two world-class scientific institutions, have been involved in most parts of the programme, from testing equipment to scenario modelling and ensuring that guidance to first responders is scientifically sound, for example. Scientists from both bodies were also seconded to the Home Office to provide direct and immediate scientific support and to maximise synergies with their respective parent organisations.

The Committee has rightly identified the need to improve the quantity and quality of science in the Home Office. I accept that point, as did our response to the Committee's report. So far, we have appointed Professor Paul Wiles as chief scientific adviser to the Home Office. He is working with Professor Sir David King, the chief scientific adviser to the Government, to improve the scientific culture of the Home Office. They are both driving that forward.

More recently, the remit of the police scientific development branch has been broadened to cover all Home Office directorates and units. The new Home Office development branch, as it will be known, will be managed by Professor Wiles and enable the Home Office to adopt a more strategic approach to science and technology. Through his involvement in the cross-Whitehall network of chief scientific advisers, Professor Wiles will also be well placed to ensure that the Home Office benefits from the scientific expertise of other Departments.

In addition to improving the use of science within the Home Office, the Committee has rightly identified the need to look more closely at CBRN counter-measures in a civil, rather than a military, context. I accept that the DSTL and existing military technologies certainly offer useful starting points, but the Government agree that the civil environment poses different challenges that require different solutions. I know that members of the Committee will clearly understand that.

Our programme needs to capture those differences. We are addressing that issue through a Home Office-led cross-government civil counter-terrorism research programme, which aims systematically to identify, prioritise and fill gaps in civil counter-terrorism research. In a way, I alluded to that when I outlined our approach. The programme has already produced a prioritised list of those research requirements, which has been agreed across all Departments, and a cross-Whitehall committee of chief scientific advisers has been tasked with scrutinising the list and ensuring that the relevant research is commissioned as part of each Department's core research programme.

That model has an important characteristic that would not necessarily be so strong if we had not a virtual, but a concrete centre for home defence: it retains the responsibility, ownership and accountability required of each Department for commissioning and delivering research relevant to its own area that is necessary for the counter-terrorism strategy. That is important. We cannot deliver everything that we need for counter-terrorism in a centralised way. We have to keep Departments involved and committed. They must own their responsibility. It has to be a cross-Government approach.

Geraldine Smith: One of the problems is having someone in charge of everything to ensure co-ordination across Departments. We all know how difficult it can be at times to achieve the joined-up government that we want. Governments, be they Labour or Conservative, have always had problems because they work in Departments. It is hard to break down that culture and to get different Departments to work together. I am glad that there seem to be some positive moves, but a home defence agency, be it virtual or concrete, could be helpful.

Beverley Hughes: This is one of the dilemmas that we face in any level of government. Some hon. Members here shared my experience in local government. I encountered the problem then. If an issue spans the gamut of the responsibility of the Government or council, there is a question of delivery. In seeking to reduce poverty among children, one cannot have a child poverty reduction department; it is necessary to have a strategy that demands the integration, commitment and involvement of all of the elements of one's work that impinge on child poverty. That could be education, social services, job creation, youth offending and so on.

It is not feasible to put in a single Department everything related to the expertise and activity that need to be deployed for counter-terrorism purposes. As all Departments have their own core business, such an approach runs the risk of allowing Departments to leave things to someone else. The main point is that there is a cross-over between the skills, capacity and expertise that individual Departments need for their core business and what they need to respond and contribute to a counter-terrorism strategy and its implementation.

Geraldine Smith: I can understand what the Minister is saying about the need to work across Departments, but with something so serious as terrorism there is also a need for someone to take ultimate charge and to have the power to work across Departments. What happens if one is dealing with another Department and it says that it has to refer back to its Minister? Such matters are difficult, unless they can be pinned down to one person who has the responsibility to work across the Departments and to co-ordinate efforts.

Beverley Hughes: At ministerial level, in terms of the relevant committees that they chair, both the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary have ultimate responsibility.

Perhaps I can outline in simple, broad terms what the structures are in government. I had planned to do so in response to an important point made earlier by the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink). I hope that these comments will reassure hon. Members.

The policy and strategy have several strands. There is a clear strategy for counter-terrorism. The capability programme is about minimising the damage from any attack and maximising our resilience. Within that programme is the CBRN programme, on which I report to the Home Secretary. Each of those elements has clearly identified work streams covering the whole range of issues and required expertise. Each work stream has an identified lead Department, lead Minister and lead senior officer, who together are responsible for reporting on and delivering the action plan and the priorities that have been agreed. It is a highly structured and detailed set of arrangements with clear accountability and responsibility at ministerial and official level. We could not operate with anything less. I assure hon. Members that those arrangements in government are really the only way in which we can deliver effectively on the complexity and range of issues that need to be addressed in an effective counter-terrorism strategy.

Bob Spink: Will the Minister therefore tell me which specific Minister is finally and fully responsible for keeping my constituents, who are in the front line of the terrorist threat, in the dark about that threat?

Beverley Hughes: If the hon. Gentleman will be a little patient, I will get to that point when I talk about secrecy and openness, which are key issues that I want to address.

We have digressed slightly from how we make the most of scientific expertise in government and how we improve our scientific base. The third issue that I want to mention is how we make the most of the knowledge base and the capabilities outside government—in industry and academia, and among our international allies. It is important that we tap the expertise of those groups.

I am confident that the cross-government civil research programme will facilitate a more focused dialogue with research councils and industry because, as I said, what has come out of it is a clear prioritised list of counter-terrorism research requirements. We will commission research by individual Departments to meet those priorities.

On the international side, I welcome the Committee's support for our strong links with our US counterparts. The Home Secretary's recent visit to the US demonstrated the strength of those links and how closely we are working together. I understand that it made a powerful impression on Members and was very much welcomed.

I agree that there is more scope for developing links at the European level. Of course, there are links already, particularly between the Department of Health and the EU Health Security Committee, and with individual countries. There are also links between our security services and those of our main European partners. I would not want hon. Members to think otherwise. Those links are very strong, and the intelligence reports that we get regularly include as much intelligence from international sources, including our European partners, as from domestic sources. All the information is put together. We share ours and they share theirs. That is the only way that we can hope to piece together the pictures that arise from information on what is happening in different parts of the world and make connections between activities. Al-Qaeda is a fluid, networked organisation with sophisticated communication patterns, and the only way to proceed is through detailed sharing of intelligence, as has been the case post-Madrid.

I also want to discuss the issue of openness and the media. The initial process by which the Committee began work and the response to its activities got off to a bad start with regard to the provision of information to it, and I realise that the wider issue of communication with the public has also been raised today. I hope, and my hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee has acknowledged, that notwithstanding that bad start, through negotiation and greater understanding of the Committee's requirements and of what information Ministers felt that they could give, the Committee heard most of the information that it needed and most hon. Members who wanted to attend did so.

It was not a question of not trusting the Committee; it was a matter of initially not being clear about the detail required, how much we could let out into the public domain and whether some information could be given in closed session. We were comfortable about sharing information on the general remit in respect of the role of science and technology, but it would not be right to put in the public domain details of operational matters and implementation, such as information on the location of radioactivity detectors. I hope that through the Committee process, as difficult as it initially was, we reached a greater understanding, and that members of the Committee will accept that if there is another similar inquiry, we can start from a higher level of understanding.

Openness in public communications is another important issue. I do not think that we have a culture of keeping secrets from the public either because we are frightened that they will panic or because we do not think that they can take that information. I think that we have a mature public who are experienced, through 30 years of Irish terrorism, in taking a realistic view of the nature of a threat and the risk that it poses, and about being determined that, notwithstanding the need for sensible precaution, observation and vigilance, they will not allow the threat of terrorism to alter the course of their daily lives.

Patrick Mercer: How does the Minister answer the point that, in response to repeated inquiries from me and other hon. Members about what state of national alert we are on, the Government say, "This is not information that we are prepared to divulge."? To find out what state of alert we are on, we have to depend on leaks from the BBC.

Beverley Hughes: The organisation responsible for assessing the threat is the fairly newly created JTAC—the Joint Terrorism Analysis Centre. That body, not Ministers, provides information on a sector-by-sector basis on any change in the threat. The Government repeat that, as we have constantly said, the threat is real and serious. The director-general of the Security Service has made it clear that she thinks that it is a question of "when, not if" an incident occurs.

The JTAC changes the perceived threat level, but not in the general way that it is changed in America. In fact, the Americans are interested in our system because they sometimes change the general level of threat in their colour-coded way, but people do not understand what that means for them. An example of how we work in this country is our response to fears about Heathrow. Extra security measures were introduced and we changed the threat level for the aviation industry and the travelling public in the air. That was a sector-specific change in the threat level. That makes more sense because it helps people to understand in a more focused way the implications for them of any change.

One or two of my hon. Friends put to one side the fact that there is a real issue about preparedness and what we can say in detail in public. We do not know fully the knowledge and understanding that terrorists have; their scientific and technical expertise; or what they know about where our vulnerabilities lie. If we put that information in the public domain and it were used in any way, we would rightly be held accountable.

I hope that Members accept that there is a difficult balance to strike. It is a question not of being secret for secrecy's sake, but of trying to strike the right balance in relation to the detail of preparedness and what we are doing to increase our capability. As John Stevens said yesterday, we have had 30 years of dealing with terrorism and talking to the public about terrorism. That is not to say that we do not need to learn new lessons; we do. However, let us remember that we have that experience. I am sure that Members will accept that Ministers feel a heavy responsibility and are committed to getting this right. That informs our practice as much as anything. We have families too, and we have constituencies. If we thought that putting more information in the public domain would be helpful, we would do it, because the protection of our people is our highest priority.

We are reviewing how we communicate with the public. As we look at what is happening around the world, we might come forward with some variation in approach. We are not saying that we think that we have got everything right or that we do not want change. Indeed, we are examining the situation thoroughly, and we have not made any decisions.

Mr. McWalter: Is my right hon. Friend saying that she is afraid that we might give terrorists ideas?

Beverley Hughes: Yes. I cannot go into specifics, but I am aware of certain technologies, and we do not know how much the terrorists know about the potential of our devices that could be used in an incident.

Mr. McWalter: Does my right hon. Friend not agree with the Americans that, if we assume that the terrorists know pretty much everything that is relevant, we will be much better prepared to deal with them than if we cross our fingers and hope that there are mutations of pathogens that they do not know about?

Beverley Hughes: Yes, I agree. Assuming that terrorists know everything informs what people do in strategic, tactical and operational terms to be prepared. However, that is not necessarily an argument in favour of telling terrorists everything, because if they did not know everything they would know it afterwards and they would have been given another tool in their armoury.

In the few minutes remaining I will try to deal with other issues that hon. Members raised. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East mentioned security of research. I am grateful for his acknowledgement that we must find a balance and a proportionate response. We must work to ensure the security of dangerous substances and knowledge, while guarding against disproportionate security measures that would undoubtedly hamper legitimate scientific research and academic freedom.

My hon. Friend also mentioned two lists: the Australia list in schedule 5 of the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 and the updated list, which is not yet incorporated in legislation. I can tell him that work on that is still going on. The counter-terrorist security officers, who are tasked with advising laboratories on their protective securities, are using the more up-to-date list, even though, strictly speaking, only the older version is legally binding. Those officers have visited most laboratories in the country and have not encountered any problems in dealing with the up-to-date list. None the less, he is right that we are examining how we can incorporate a revised single list in the legislation. That needs to be done. I am simply saying that the fact that we have not yet done it is not affecting practice, which is based on the up-to-date list.

My hon. Friend also talked about the voluntary vetting scheme, which is also under review, and the Committee's recommendation for an ethical code of conduct, which is interesting. As a result of that suggestion, he knows that we are consulting representatives of the research community on the viability and value of such a code. Its implementation will be discussed under the auspices of the biological weapons convention next year.

I want to touch on a couple of points about health, and particularly the role of GPs, which my hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee raised. The Department of Health has done quite a bit of work to ensure that information, including information on biological agents in particular, is disseminated to front-line professionals. It has funded the Health Protection Agency this year to undertake a programme of work to raise awareness through a number of initiatives: training sessions for accident and emergency staff together with police, fire and ambulance personnel are being delivered in each region; clinical action cards for GPs have been produced and are being distributed to every GP; training sessions for GPs are being delivered locally through the "train the trainer" mechanism, whatever that is; standard training material is being provided for use in GP postgraduate courses; there are exercises for training consultants; and so on. Therefore, "They are on the case" is the message. That programme is continuing.

The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) and one or two other hon. Members raised the important question of exercises. I agree that it is critical that people do not merely write down what they should do in guidance, operational and procedural notes and so on. Departments and Government agencies already carry out exercises, including on a statutory basis, that are designed to test the planning and framework arrangements for radiological and biological incidents, using deliberate releases and accidents. Those will continue to be a feature of the exercise programme for CBRN resilience and counter-terrorism.

Numbers are also an issue. Since spring last year, there have been seven very large-scale live exercises. Six took place in England and one in Scotland. In addition, there were more than 30 smaller table-top exercises to support them. They took place in different parts of the country. There are also the counter-balance exercises, which I think I mentioned earlier. They are organised jointly by the Home Office, regional resilience teams, the devolved Administrations and the emergency planning societies. All those exercises focus on CBRN and long-term resilience. Since last year, there have been seven counter-balance exercises in England and one in Wales.

Therefore, there is an ongoing and not insignificant programme of exercises at different levels to ensure that people practise what they are supposed to do and that they learn the lessons. Indeed, I do not agree that the Osiris initiative was unsuccessful. It taught us a great deal about how dealing with the health issues in particular and identifying and assessing an incident at an early stage can be most effectively achieved.

As time is up, if I have not addressed a particular issue I will write to hon. Members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I say to the Minister that she finished in the nick of time? I congratulate the Chamber on a high-quality debate on a very important subject. All those who participated are to be congratulated on their contributions.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Five o'clock.

Access to Justice (Rural Areas)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Derek Twigg.]

9.30 am

Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West) (Lab): Good morning, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is a pleasure to take part once again in a debate under your most able and courteous chairmanship. It is also a pleasure to see my hon. Friend the Minister, as well as the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Malins), who shadows the Department for Constitutional Affairs as the Conservative spokesman on legal issues, and the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who is the Liberal Democrat spokesman. Other hon. Members are also present.

I hope that the debate will focus on topical and important issues. Although I declare an interest at the outset as a member of the Bar, the debate is not about the need for lawyers to have their own trade union. Of course, they are not always the most popular section of the community, and there has been a fair amount of propaganda against them—not least, I am afraid to say, from Government Front Benchers. Some of that criticism is justified, but the issue of access to justice and legal aid is not about lawyers—it is about real, vulnerable people who are in difficulties. Regardless of whether those people have divorce, employment, or mental health problems, or are involved in civil or debt disputes, they are vulnerable and need help, and lawyers are still the main suppliers of legal help and representation.

I welcome the Government's reform of legal aid, which they introduced through the Access to Justice Act 1999; I sat on the Standing Committee that debated the Bill. However, we need to review the impact of those changes, including the introduction of the contract culture, particularly in more peripheral areas, such as my rural and semi-rural constituency in north Wales.

The Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs is currently conducting an inquiry into the issue, and various relevant parties have provided substantial evidence. Furthermore, in February, the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux published an important and rather critical report called "Geography of Advice", of which I am sure that the Minister is aware. It revealed that 40 per cent. of citizens advice bureaux thought that they were operating in an "advice desert", and my contribution will focus on that issue. In some parts of the country it is very difficult, if not impossible, to get a legal aid solicitor. That is causing hardship, and I want the Department to consider how its policies are being implemented.

There was a need to reform the old system, under which civil legal aid was demand led. There was also a need to control the budget and to ensure a more strategic approach to the provision of legal services so that need matched what suppliers could offer. Furthermore, there was a need to reconsider the issue of who provided those legal services. I entirely agree with the Government that we need a mixed economy of providers, to use the jargon. In other words, it is not just lawyers who should be able to give advice. In some cases, those involved in giving benefits advice should provide it. There is scope for giving advice over the telephone. There are different ways to go about it.

Expenditure had to be controlled. A bureaucracy was needed—after all, bureaucracy is essentially just a method of ensuring that public money is spent correctly, in accordance with a set of rules. However, I question whether it is proportionate. There has been much criticism of the dead hand of bureaucracy; many solicitors are said to find the auditing and reporting requirements a huge burden.

I welcome the philosophy behind the Access to Justice Act 1999. That is my starting point, and the debate is, from my point of view, primarily about civil legal aid, although there has been concern—and I know that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) will refer to this—about magistrates court closures. I suppose that the title of the debate is wide enough to encompass them. They have caused difficulties in north Wales, although I accept the Government's case for some element of rationalisation. However, it needs to be done more flexibly and sensitively.

There has been a significant decline in the number of solicitors doing legal aid work. For example, 8,900 such solicitors practised family law—the backbone of civil legal aid—just before the implementation of the Access to Justice Act 1999, and the figure has now dropped to 3,800. That in itself is not alarming. It was to be expected. In so far as I accept that there has been an improvement in the quality of service offered by solicitors' firms, what has happened is none the less a warning signal. Perhaps the number of people leaving legal aid work has reached the stage at which it is becoming a bit of a crisis. The Government need to take notice.

I have already mentioned the NACAB "Geography of Advice" report, which refers to the figure that I have mentioned and states:

> "In the economic context of cost cutting and contracting, solicitors have found cities the easiest and most profitable areas to serve because the greatest numbers of potential clients are concentrated within the smallest travelling distance. The consequence has been that the number of access points into the legal aid system has reduced."

I want the Minister to deal with that issue. Does he acknowledge that there is a problem, and that there are advice deserts?

The report goes on to say that the new contract regime appears to be ineffective at filling what are described as advice gaps, where there are shortages of competent advisers in specialist areas of law such as immigration and asylum. Therefore, over and above replying to my general point about the lack of practitioners providing civil legal aid, will the Minister tell me whether he has any worries about specialist areas of work?

The report also states that > "the trend towards clustering of services in urban centres combined with trends towards the increasing specialisation and economies of scale in legal business, has been accompanied by a decline in the number of legal practitioners bidding for CLS contract work. Within this broad analysis there are significant regional variations. However, the trend is clear—significant parts of the country are inadequately serviced by legal aid lawyers or other appropriate services, and this is likely to intensify."

I ask the Minister again to respond to those points. I share the concerns of the report's authors.

I conclude my references to the report by quoting from paragraph 2.39:

"There are critical problems in gaining access to legal services in rural areas with dispersed and small populations, which means that pockets of poverty are difficult to identify when planning services and poor and expensive public transport provides a significant barrier."

Rurality is difficult to assess. There are some sparsely populated areas in north Wales and other parts of the country: the west country, mid-Wales and north Yorkshire in particular. However, there are also reasonably sizeable market towns with a population of anything between 4,000 and 15,000, which are certainly not conurbations. The way in which the system operates tends to take work away not only from purely rural areas but from those market towns. A reasonably sized solicitors' practice for such a community might be anything between eight or 10 partners. That is small in the context of the bigger picture, and very small in comparison with larger practices.

The fact that such practices are small and generalist in nature, doing both legal aid and private work—indeed the legal aid work has traditionally been subsidised by the private work—means that the generalist high street practitioners in reasonably sized market towns such as Colwyn Bay and Abergele in my constituency, and I am sure that hon. Members could mention others, are being squeezed out. I would like the Minister to accept that that is an issue. I am asking for greater flexibility in the way in which the Legal Services Commission lets contracts and controls the budgets. I accept the need to control the budget.

While I am on the question of the budget, I would like the Minister to comment on the bigger picture. There are serious question marks over the extent to which the great idea of a community legal service is financially sustainable. The Minister will know that the service has operated under what is euphemistically called a standstill budget for the past three years. There has been a freeze on payment rates to legal aid solicitors. I am not weeping crocodile tears for solicitors; I am concerned about the economic effect. The freeze means that fewer solicitors are confident that they can make a sustainable business out of legal aid and they are getting out of it. We then have a social problem, as people cannot get legal aid easily.

Bearing in mind that the budget has been frozen for the past three years, can the Minister tell us whether it is likely to increase? The Minister has been on the record on the issue. If problems of a legal nature—domestic violence is a classic example, or problems with housing—are dealt with expeditiously by a competent solicitor and a remedy is sought, all sorts of difficulties can be avoided later on. That can have a benign effect on other budgets, not least that of the Department for Work and Pensions.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point about saving money. A magistrate in my area by the name of Lynette Kretchner, who is the chair of the youth courts, is concerned that children from special schools constantly keep turning up in the youth courts. It seems that the special schools are referring those children to the youth courts for quite inappropriate matters. That is damaging to children in the long term. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if access to justice in rural areas was effectively resourced and properly planned, we could perhaps do something about that? At the moment, we are investing in a long-term problem—irreparable damage to those young people.

Gareth Thomas: I note what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I am sure that the Minister will respond to that.

To re-emphasise the point, the community legal service is a vital part of the Government's agenda to combat social exclusion. There is a good case for the Minister to go to the Treasury and ask for quite a lot more money. That would be prudence. Surely it is part of the Government's cross-cutting approach? While we are on the subject of cross-cutting approaches and joined-up government, does the Minister accept that there is a need for greater co-operation between his Department and other Departments, not least the Department for Work and Pensions, in providing legal advice and advice on benefits, particularly in this context? Does it not follow that the DWP and other Departments should be prepared to provide subventions to his Department? I make that point because several people involved in this matter believe that the Government should take note of it, particularly if they are committed to an holistic approach—if I may use that jargon—to the provision of legal advice and representation.

The other major question to ask the Minister is whether the Government acknowledge that there is a need to cut bureaucracy. I am sure that other hon. Members are also concerned about the disproportionate amount of bureaucracy. The Minister will be aware that the legal aid civil contract has no fewer than 250 pages, and that the guidance to it has 1,000 pages. Dealing with that and the auditing requirements is eating into solicitors' time—time that could be spent more effectively dealing with the vulnerable people who come to solicitors' offices, sometimes in despair, for immediate legal advice and representation.

Is the Minister satisfied that the community legal services partnerships are working effectively? I doubt that they are in north Wales. I want the local authorities to be more supportive. The community legal service needs to provide more financial assistance to the committees. The CLS partnerships, the profession and other providers do not communicate well enough with each other. Should local authorities have a duty to co-operate with a CLS partnership, which are, after all, critical to the objective of matching need and demand to the supplier base?

I am concerned about the lack of transparency of CLS decision-making. I recently met several legal aid solicitors who practise family law in my constituency and who received a terse letter from the Legal Services

Commission dated 25 November 2003. I will quote from the letter sent to Mr. Dylan Rhys Jones of J. R. Williams, which is based in Abergele. It says:

"Thank you for your application to be included on the bid panel.

"The Legal Services Committee for Wales identified your zone as having a higher number of case starts than average in Wales and therefore as a zone where we could consider a reduction in the number of case starts authorised in order to free up some funding towards areas of higher priority.

"You will therefore have to be assessed against specified criteria so that we can give priority to certain areas of work and to the best suppliers."

That letter offended the solicitors who received it. They deal with a large number of family cases, only to be told that the LSC is prepared to pull the plug on them because they are busy doing their job as effectively as possible. That is unacceptable. I met Linda Summers, the chief executive of the Legal Services Commission in Wales, who told me that the decision had been reversed. I will, however, quote from a letter that I recently sent her following my meeting with the solicitors in my constituency, who said that there was a pressing need for stability of funding from the LSC to enable them to provide an effective service to the community. Will the Minister comment on the need for stability of funding? In my letter, I asked the LSC in Wales:

"In relation to the L.S.C.'s strategy, how are the 'priorities' established? Are you satisfied that the local partnerships are working effectively? You will recall that the solicitors present were very sceptical and I share that scepticism."

Other points were made, but the general feeling among solicitors in the part of Wales that I represent is that there is a problem with the provision of legal aid services in rural, semi-rural and peripheral areas outside the main conurbations.

I should like the Minister to acknowledge that that is a problem and to say that the Government will deal with it and will be flexible and imaginative in their approach. We will never achieve completely unrestricted access to justice in the real world, but the Government are striving to provide that and are on the right track, although they must consider specifically what is happening in rural areas.

9.51 am

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I congratulate the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Gareth Thomas) on securing this debate on a very important subject. I also convey to him congratulations from my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd). Unfortunately, he has been detained in Committee elsewhere this morning, but he would have liked to be here to discuss this extremely important subject on a normal rainy Tuesday. If I were the hon. Member for Clwyd, West, I would be pleased to have secured the debate, but I think that its importance will demand a more prominent slot if we return to the subject in future.

There has been a major programme of closures of magistrates courts in rural north Wales during the past 10 years; for example, I think that seven courts have closed in the past 10 years in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy. His constituency is approximately 100 miles north to south and 100 miles north-east to south-west. In the late 1970s, there were seven magistrates courts in the area, at Penrhyndeudraeth, Blaenau Ffestiniog, Barmouth, Bala, Llanrwst, Tywyn and Dolgellau. Those are small communities, but they are significant to that large rural area, and all the courts closed. Currently, there is only one court—at Dolgellau—and local people and legal professionals believe that it has been retained only because it is occasionally used as a Crown court. Meirionnydd Nant Conwy is the third-largest constituency in terms of geography, but it has only one magistrates court. Clearly, people are not well served by that situation.

I remember well the case that was made when the last magistrates court was closed, at Blaenau Ffestiniog. My hon. Friend made representations to the Lord Chancellor's Department, although he told me at the time that he believed that that was a waste of time. Many sensible arguments were proposed by members of various benches in Meirionnydd, but the then Under-Secretary at the Lord Chancellor's Department seemed to pay no heed whatever to those arguments.

The case for closing the magistrates court at Blaenau Ffestiniog was as thin as it could be. Two years before the closure, £20,000 had been spent to upgrade the facilities. Then came the debate about closure. The best case for closure proposed by the clerk was that £12,000 would be saved directly. However, that case did not take into consideration the cost of transport and of solicitors, defendants, who were perhaps on legal aid, and magistrates having to travel many miles. In north-west Wales, we are in the unfortunate position whereby justices sometimes have to travel to my constituency and the town of Pwllheli from south Meirionnydd. That is a round trip of between 150 and 160 miles, which is a long way for justices to travel, as they are not always the youngest of people, nor in the best of health for that matter.

Lembit Öpik: Is not the irony of closing magistrates courts for accessibility reasons that those enormously long return journeys make justice far less accessible? Perhaps the Government should think about investing some of the £350 million of unpaid parking tickets and court costs in reopening some of those courts, which would at least show that they are serious about access to justice.

Hywel Williams: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. We must ask ourselves what is economic in the delivery of justice to people in those dispersed and rural communities. I suspect that large pots of money are secreted in various parts of the system that could be more usefully deployed.

There is a serious point to be made about the delivery of justice. The justice of the peace system was devised to deliver justice locally through people who know the community well, but that is largely going by the board due to the closure programme. The hon. Gentleman will know that a similar process has being going on for several years in other parts of Powys and in rural Dyfed.

I propose the concept of justice miles. If it is unjustified—on both economic and environmental grounds—to transport green beans from Zimbabwe to a supermarket in Caernarfon, surely it is equally unjustified to transport defendants, witnesses and justices from the furthest reaches of Cwm Croesor to

[Hywel Williams]

Dolgellau, or Caernarfon. That would take a day by bus, which is impractical. While we are on the subject of green beans, what about the baby sweetcorn that is transported from Colombia? I could go on, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I think that might try your patience.

Suffice it to say, it is difficult for people taking part in cases to arrive at the courts by 10 am, or even by 2 pm. My party is not against change for change's sake, but in this case the economic argument has been deployed insensitively and indiscriminately in rural areas of north Wales and elsewhere in the UK, as I am sure that other hon. Members will attest. Were we to accept that argument, it could then be applied elsewhere: there is a nice piece of real estate at the end of the Strand—I believe that it is called the royal courts of justice—that could easily be fashioned into a nice hotel. What if the royal courts of justice were to be relocated to north Wembley? I do not say that there is anything wrong with north Wembley, but I had the unfortunate experience of travelling there recently on the Bakerloo line—albeit with only a few changes.

We do not want members of the judiciary to trek to north Wembley, however easy that is. No one is seriously suggesting that, yet it seems just as reasonable as expecting defendants, lawyers and members of the bench to travel huge distances in rural areas. That is not access to justice, but the dismantling of a perfectly good system to cut costs, and it is detrimental to everyone involved.

9.59 am

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Gareth Thomas) on initiating this debate. I will try to bring a little Yorkshire influence to the debate, to balance the Welsh influence. There have always been good relations between Yorkshire and Wales, and I am sure that that will be true this morning.

First, I want to address a point that my hon. Friend mentioned: he said that he is a little shy about promoting the cause of solicitors and their importance in rural areas. However, in many market towns such as Selby—one of the market towns that I represent—solicitors are an important part of the local economy. People take great pride in the fact that local legal advice is available.

I, too, intend to concentrate on magistrates courts. Often in Westminster Hall, I have to bring bad news from Selby, whether it be about floods or the closure of mines, but today I want to tell hon. Members about a successful campaign to save a magistrates court. I also want to draw out one or two general lessons and to ask my hon. Friend the Minister some questions.

The steady national decline of magistrates courts to which other hon. Members have referred has been reflected locally in North Yorkshire. The list of court closures during the past decade under successive Governments reads like an ode to the train stations closed by Beeching—Market Rasen, Newmarket, Christchurch, Windsor, Thirsk, Dover, Blyth and Loughborough. They are all small, market towns that took great pride in their courts. The court closure programme has gone on for 10 years, and it has had a massive impact on the delivery of local justice.

The question of closing Selby magistrates court was first mooted in 2001—the year in which the Auld report into our criminal justice system was published. One reference to North Yorkshire was buried deep in the report. Auld referred to the notion of local justice being unreal in many rural counties, quoting North Yorkshire as an example:

> "Similarly, in North Yorkshire, nine magistrates' courts serve a population of 742,000 spread over 3,000 square miles."

There have been three court closures in North Yorkshire since then, so we are now below the rump that in 2001 Auld said already made unreal any notion of local justice.

There was a massive campaign in Selby to try to save the courthouse. Most of the good citizens of Selby need never go near the court, yet local justice has an amazing resonance, and not just among solicitors. Local reporters and newspapers want justice delivered locally so that they can report it, which is sometimes a neglected aspect of the importance of local justice, and I received hundreds of letters from people to say that they could not possibly attend court in York, which would have been the alternative.

For example, I received a letter from someone in the village of Kirk Smeaton, who had recently been a witness in a case heard in Selby. They had been asked to arrive at the court in Selby at 10 o'clock. To get from Kirk Smeaton to York for that time, they would have had to take the 6.40 am bus to Pontefract, which arrives at 7.23. They would then have had to change to get to Selby at 8.10, before getting a bus to York at about half past 8, arriving at almost 10 o'clock. That person would have had to take three buses to get to York, and the proposed new courthouse would not even be in the city centre. Those practical reasons made people campaign strongly to keep the courthouse in Selby.

On 9 March, the North Yorkshire magistrates courts service issued a press release; it sounds a bit prosaic, but in Selby history it will be regarded like the Gettysburg address. It will resonate down the decades and centuries. The justices' chief executive, Paul Bradley, said that the magistrates courts committee's preferred option was to have > "two courthouses to serve the York/Selby area—a new courthouse in York and a separate courthouse in Selby."

He also said:

> "In the coming months, I intend to hold discussions with officials in the Department for Constitutional Affairs to see how this can be achieved—either by the provision of a new courthouse in Selby or, probably more likely, by adapting and refurbishing the present courthouse."

I realise that we have been fortunate locally in many ways, but I want to end by making some points to my hon. Friend the Minister. Will he take a personal interest in the discussions that will be initiated by North Yorkshire to ensure that the story will have a happy ending for Selby? He is a high-flying Minister with a reputation for rethinking policy, and I detect that Ministers are starting to pause for thought and consider whether the process of efficiency and closing magistrates courts in rural areas has gone too far. On the one hand, Departments send me a leaflet a week on rural proofing and how we must consider services in terms of rural delivery, yet on the other hand, there has for years been a policy of magistrates court closures in rural areas.

I get the impression that Ministers are allowing one or two more appeals and that there are signs of a rethink. This is an excellent opportunity for the Minister to nuance the policy and to state that it is worth making appeals because the Government recognise the importance of local magistrates courts in delivering local justice in rural areas in England and Wales.

10.5 am

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I apologise for being slightly late. I did not realise the severity of the affliction that had overcome my hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), but I assure hon. Members that it is not stage fright—he has never been known to suffer from that.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Gareth Thomas) for securing the debate. The issue of access to justice in rural areas has affected my constituency and much of rural Wales over the past year or so, and I was privileged to secure a short debate in Westminster Hall, which was answered by the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie), in which I raised court closures in my constituency. I may refer to that debate later.

We all welcome the Government's commitment to making justice accessible to everyone. That lies at the heart of people's rights and of civil justice, but I fear that it is under threat in rural areas. There is no better deterrent to criminals than the certainty of detection and conviction, but many cases in rural areas are not pursued because of the difficulty of getting witnesses, and sometimes even victims—despite the assistance that they receive from Victim Support, to which I pay tribute—to attend court. Notwithstanding that support, it is often difficult for victims to attend court to see that justice is done and give evidence, because it is a stressful occasion and because of the difficulty of making the journey on public transport, if they do not have private transport.

As well as those problems, it has come to my attention lately that a number of rural solicitors firms have stopped accepting legal aid work. I spoke this week to a solicitor in my county town whose firm—the oldest established in the area—has regrettably decided against taking legal aid work despite realising the need for it. Therefore, people have less choice and less access to such support.

Yesterday morning, I was detained in my constituency by a lady who rang up and travelled 45 miles to my office because she could not get legal aid. She is the respondent in a divorce case and wanted advice on how to fill out forms. I did not feel able to give such advice, but I did what I could. She is on a low income, but has been refused legal aid because of the value of her house. Some people in rural areas who are on a low income live in relatively expensive residences.

My constituent was more concerned about the care of and contact with her children because she wants them educated at home, but her husband wants them to be educated in school. That is obviously not a run-of-the-mill situation and she desperately needed legal advice, but she was, as far as she could see, unable to get any. She asked me whether there is some system of pro bono work to help people facing such issues. I have great sympathy with the hon. Member for Clwyd, West on this: people in rural areas cannot get the specialised legal support that they need.

I am involved in an ongoing consultation with the Minister, and we are still fighting the closure of Ystradgynlais and Llandrindod magistrates courts. Things have become quite interesting. It was put to the local authority that unless it opposed the closure of Ystradgynlais and Llandrindod magistrates courts we could end up with no magistrates courts at all in Powys. That is recorded in the county council minutes. When the magistrates court committee presented its proposals that phrase was used. This is intolerable and the more I see of it, the more I am appalled.

Just across the border in Ceredigion, the council opposed the closure of Aberystwyth magistrates court. The Department, to its credit, overturned the decision and a new magistrates court will be built in Aberystwyth. The necessary funding has already been found. I congratulate the Department. I am fighting a rearguard action for the magistrates court system in my constituency and in Powys. I am pleased that the magistrates court in Newtown will go ahead shortly, subject to some planning problems being resolved and funding being found. Powys is the most sparsely populated local government area of England and Wales. People talk about Cumbria being sparsely populated, but Powys is three times more sparsely populated than that county, and people in Powys have to travel a huge distance to court and there is little public transport.

The debate is a wonderful opportunity to raise issues with the Minister. We all look forward to watching his career progress. Perhaps something he can do today will drive it forward.

Hywel Williams: A milestone.

Mr. Roger Williams: Yes, a milestone. We have raised two issues: legal aid, particularly in rural areas, and how we can strengthen the system while ensuring that it is readily available, and magistrates courts. I am pleased that the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) was able to report on how a decision was overturned in his constituency. We look forward to the Government responding to our concerns about access to justice in rural areas and making similar decisions in future.

10.13 am

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Gareth Thomas) on securing the debate. It is an extraordinarily important debate. As the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) said, it is a matter to which we hope to be able to return on a larger stage. The principle of local justice is fundamental to our legal system. It goes back to the great charter and the idea that people are tried by their peers and that justice is administered locally by the people and the community affected by the crime.

There is a danger that that principle will be lost for the best possible reasons, reasons of efficiency, effectiveness and so-called rationalisation, while completely ignoring the impact on local, and especially rural, communities. Rural areas often seem to be forgotten in the formation of policy, but the real effect of court closures is on communities in rural areas, who feel that the criminal justice system is retreating from them and that the police services do not recognise their needs because for good, operational reasons they concentrate their activities on the higher empirical levels of crime in the big cities. Court closures make people in the rural communities feel abandoned by the criminal justice system, which is a dangerous position for them to be in.

Gareth Thomas: The hon. Gentleman may want to make a stab at defining a rural area. Does he agree that lots of people live in rural communities of one sort or another? Does he accept that the issue of access to justice embraces many different types of communities in rural areas, not necessarily those in the back of beyond?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. I will not attempt a definition because I do not think that there is a satisfactory one; it will vary in different parts of the country. I entirely embrace his position, that the key to the issue is the market town, which is the hub of rural areas. Of course, people do not expect every village to have its own court, but they expect every community, in the wider sense, to have one, and that is what is being lost.

There are two principal strands to this well-informed and passionate debate: first, the provision of legal services, the main bone of contention in the speech of the hon. Member for Clwyd, West, which I commend; and secondly, the closure of magistrates courts, to which the hon. Members for Caernarfon and for Selby (Mr. Grogan) and my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) drew attention.

I am not a lawyer, but I agree with the hon. Member for Clwyd, West on the provision of legal services. I am sick and tired of the easy and rather lazy caricature of all lawyers as fat-cat, city types who make a packet from legal aid. I see lawyers working at the other end of the system—not fat cats, but general practitioners of the legal service working in family practices in rural areas, and trying to provide a service to their community. They are unfortunately being caught in the backwash of an attitude that is increasingly shown by Ministers, who should know better, and peddled in the press, that the entire legal profession is simply trying to maximise its profits at the expense of others. I put it on the record that I do not believe that that is the case. It worries me that there is a contraction of those practices.

The hon. Member for Clwyd, West mentioned family law, which needs to be bound up with, and close to, rural communities if it is to be effective. It is no good if those who provide advice on family law and other specialist matters are remote from those communities, as that simply does not work. He also talked about advice deserts, which, perversely, are common in rural areas and in some of the most affluent parts of the country. The worst news is for people who do not have much money but live in an area that is considered affluent, because they will be cut off from every sort of support. They will not have the advantages that people who live in urban areas receive.

The hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Malins) may be able to expand on the fact that some parts of Surrey, which are thought of as desirable, affluent areas, are precisely those where the provision of advice support is at its lowest, because no one imagines that people living there may be in trouble and unable to afford legal advice.

What worries me—I do not think it has been mentioned yet—is the contraction of criminal defence work. The availability of criminal defence lawyers is a problem in large parts of the country; in an area such as mine, very few are willing to undertake criminal defence work. In Frome, a single practitioner—a partner in a local firm—does 99 per cent. of the criminal defence work in the local courts. He freely admits that he is cross-subsidised by his partners' work, because they are prepared to humour him by allowing him to continue what he thinks—as do I—is important work in providing defence services for the local community. However, any monopoly provider in any area poses problems. He often has prospective conflicts of interest, because if one young thug beats up another, he can bet his life that he has represented them both in the same courts. It is difficult—I am not sure that he accepts this—to make the same speeches before the same magistrates in support of the same individuals time after time. That is not good for the interests of justice either. He has said, worryingly, that if the local court closes, it will no longer be sustainable for him to make a 30 or 40-mile trip to a court to represent his clients, and he will not do it. That means that nobody will be providing criminal defence work in my area.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): The hon. Gentleman has made a good point about travel. He will know that under legal aid rates, the money paid to lawyers for travelling time is so poor that it utterly discourages them from travelling for more than, say, 20 minutes to anywhere.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman is right. Other professionals are not put in that position. There is a direct analogy between the provision of general legal and general medical services. Every town with a medical practice should have a legal practice providing a range of services to local people, but that is not currently the case. Sadly, it is increasingly not the case because there has been an unfortunate continuation, and in some cases acceleration, of court closure programmes across the country.

Since the Government came to power, 115 courts have been closed. That is not unique to this Government—it happened under the previous one, too—but it is a continuation of a trend that has not abated until a recent policy change. It would be welcome if the Minister could confirm that there has been a change of policy. The hon. Member for Caernarfon and my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire talked about Wales, which, with 10 court closures since 1997, has been worst hit of all.

With the closure of a court, not only do the services go, but the physical entity is closed. That has huge symbolic importance: the court in a market town is often a prominent building, and is the community's guarantee that crimes committed locally are dealt with locally. Sometimes, the buildings themselves are equally important, and some closures have left fine buildings empty. The court in Keswick comes to mind: it is a listed building and has stood empty for four years. Presteigne, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire, has another fine building that now has no effective use. I do not think that sufficient attention has been paid to how those courts are made usable. I accept the argument that courts should have easy access and be safe for the users, as nobody should be forced to use buildings that are entirely unsuitable, but we should make them appropriate for use, rather than making the easy and lazy assumption that the best solution is to close a court and replace it with a concrete monstrosity on the edge of the nearest big city.

There are also practical reasons why courts need to be kept open—transport, for instance, has already been mentioned. Convenience for court users is a key factor. It is not acceptable to have to travel long distances to act as a witness, solicitor, social worker or defendant.

Mr. Roger Williams: The magistrates court committee in Powys tried to use the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 to close Llandrindod court. However, it was told firmly that the purpose of the Act was to make facilities accessible, not to close them when it is difficult to do so.

Mr. Heath: That is a clear illustration of what I have in mind. The fact that the police must travel long distances to get to courts has operational significance. There are already far too few police officers in many rural areas, because of operational reasons to which I have alluded. If the magistrates court is 30 miles away, the police are also 30 miles away attending court cases, which takes them out of area. That is not acceptable, and the same goes for the other professionals involved.

The hon. Member for Selby made an important point about reporting. If justice is to be seen to be done, reports of proceedings in the magistrates court need to be in the local newspaper. We need to be able to see that X has received a fine, a community sentence or a spell in prison for the crimes that he has committed in that community. That will not happen if the magistrates court is in a nearby big city that the local newspaper does not cover.

I want to refer to some parochial matters. My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire talked about Ystradgynlais court and the hon. Member for Selby talked about Selby. I want to talk, briefly, about Frome. My constituency covers about 900 square miles but has only one magistrates court, which is under threat of closure, as is the court in the city of Wells, which is not in my constituency. The magistrates court committee firmly believes that the new unified courts system will result in the loss of both courts. The committee argues that it would therefore be better to pre-empt that by closing two courts and opening another court, which would not be convenient for the people of Frome, Wells or Shepton Mallet, as an alternative.

I cannot speak for Wells, but Frome court serves a town of about 20,000 or 22,000 and a large rural hinterland. It is the only court remaining in my constituency, which is large by English standards, if not by Welsh or Scottish standards. It is not in the interests of justice for that court to close. I hope that, with the new unified courts system, we shall take a new look not only at magistrates courts but, where appropriate, at the Crown court, and most importantly, family courts and the youth court system. We should start from a different basis and ask how such communities can best be served. How do we ensure that there is a network of courts in the unified court system that will help access in rural areas, maintain the presence of the criminal justice system and employ rural-proofing? We hear so much about that, but it don't mean a thing if it ain't got that swing. Often we do not see the effect of rural-proofing on the Government's policies.

I hope that I am not being unkind to either civil servants or the Minister here, but at times I think that some civil servants and Ministers simply do not understand what it is like to live in a village in the middle of Somerset and have huge difficulties in moving about, because there is no public transport system. They do not appear to understand the problems in relating to a criminal justice system that even now seems remote, even before the further depredations that we expect. I hope that he will say explicitly that the Government's policy will be to maintain a courts presence in rural areas, and that they will support those courts. I hope that we will not see further closures without replacement, and that the courts will continue to serve the communities that need to be served by our criminal justice system.

10.30 am

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Gareth Thomas) on securing the debate and on the thoughtful way in which he introduced the subject. I also thank the hon. Members for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams), for Selby (Mr. Grogan), for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) and for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) for their contributions to this excellent debate.

I declare an interest. My background is as a solicitor, a recorder of the Crown court, and a district judge operating in magistrates courts—formerly a stipendiary magistrate. The topic is therefore close to my heart. I agree with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome and with other hon. Members who have said that justice is better justice when it is local. The less local it is, the worse it becomes in many respects.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, through a series of questions, has elicited the fact that since 1997, 115 magistrates courts in England and Wales have closed, a fact that I regret greatly. However, it is right not to make too much of a party political point of the matter, because it is a world trend, even though it has accelerated somewhat since 1997.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire referred to his Adjournment debate in February 2004, during which the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) made a statement with which we would all agree, saying

"we expect magistrates to have a strong local connection and to live or work in the area in which they serve."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 3 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 235WH.]

I say hear, hear to that. However, I am not sure that it fits the current trend.

I am very disappointed that so many magistrates courts are closing. I am not remotely persuaded by the argument that some of the buildings are slightly old-fashioned and that a more modern building 30 miles away would bring better justice. I preferred the days when the court was local, even if the interview arrangements were not ideal, and there were local magistrates. Moreover, in those days, there was a fair chance that the clerk to the justice would be legally qualified, whereas currently few of them are. Such clerks to the justices often did a splendid job in representing the interests of the unrepresented defendant in the courts—one does not see that so often now.

If we close courts, we lose a great deal. We lose magistrates who know their own area like the back of their hand. Magistrates who know an area well are a real plus. We lose magistrates who know the prevalent crimes in their area, which is important when it comes to sentencing. Currently, when I sit as a judge, I look at local guidelines on prevalent crime, because there may be a sentencing proposal that is slightly off the norm to deal with the prevalence of a crime in a particular area. We would lose that expertise.

If we close courts, we also lose magistrates who know, for example, their pubs and licensed premises well, which is often important in relation to licensing matters and crime. We also lose magistrates who know the local police force and local advocates well, and know which advocates they can trust and rely on.

Gareth Thomas: It is interesting that the subject of the debate has moved from access to justice to access to courts, which is a different concept. The hon. Gentleman has mentioned that he is a district judge—what used to be called a stipendiary magistrate. What is his view on the trend towards the greater use of stipendiaries rather than lay magistrates? What effect is that having on the delivery of local justice by lay people?

Mr. Malins: I was going to make that point, and the hon. Gentleman is right to raise it. Having declared an interest, I should say that magistrates and justices of the peace play a vital role, and I would be unhappy if the long-term trend were towards placing district judges in remote centres to deal with crime. The role of the magistracy is very important, especially in rural areas.

To return to an earlier point, if one closes local courts, one loses the vital connection between the crime and the local newspaper. Currently, when someone commits a crime on Monday, they are in court on Wednesday, the story is in the local newspaper by Thursday, and everyone knows about it. That is an important aspect of community life.

What problems confront judges and magistrates when local courts close, and defendants and witnesses have to travel vast distances? I can tell hon. Members that the problems are immense. In truth, many defendants simply will not travel a long way to court, and, indeed, many cannot afford to do so. The same applies to witnesses, who are critical to trials, because many are reluctant or unable to travel great distances.

More often than not, I grant bail. When I grant it to defendants who live 30 miles from the court, it is my practice to tell them that I will bail them not until 10 am the following day but until 12 noon or even 2 pm. That is the only way in which I can give them a real chance of making it back to court. My mind boggles at the prospect of a defendant being bailed for 10 am, when the magistrates court is in a remote area 30 miles from where he or she lives. There will be no rural transport, so, for many people, the chance of getting there for 10 am is almost zero. That would not be the case for you or me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because, to be blunt, we could afford a taxi and ensure that we got there. However, many disadvantaged people—whether defendants or witnesses—cannot do that, and a defendant would commit an offence under the Bail Act 1976 if they did not appear in court. Trials are cracked or collapse because people do not turn up, and thousands of pounds are wasted when they could have been better used elsewhere.

What does the community lose if there is no local court? It loses a lot. It probably will not have in its midst quite as many trainee solicitors as it used to. Does that matter? Well, many of those young men and women contribute to their communities in different ways. They take an active role in church life, local government and sporting clubs. They take an interest in and are committed to local matters. Between them, they would probably do more pro bono work if they were present in numbers. If courts are closed, however, there will be fewer such people in the community.

There will also be fewer local probation staff and fewer people interested in joining Victim Support. In addition, people will be much discouraged from joining the magistracy, particularly if they are told that they will have to travel 20 or 30 miles for their sittings. As the hon. Member for Clwyd, West said, the long-term trend is potentially damaging not only to local communities and those affected by the administration of justice but to the lay bench. Finally, as I mentioned in passing, another result of such changes is that fewer people will be interested in joining the clerks profession, and the role of the qualified justice's clerk is a vital aspect of our society.

So, local courts are good news for reasons of expense, justice and sheer efficiency and high standards. Courts a long way from where defendants and witnesses live are bad news.

Legal aid rates and money are an aspect of local justice, and access to justice, that has been mentioned in several speeches. I think that it was the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome who drew an analogy between health provision and legal provision in a town, and it was a good one. Every town should have lawyers who are capable of giving advice to the underprivileged. It is all very well for me to get in my motor car and travel 40 miles to London. I can do that.

However, the people who need the system are, more often than not, those who cannot jump into a smart motor car to travel 40 miles for advice. Those are the sort of people we should look after. They need advice on housing and benefits; and what about matrimonial matters, including the urgent injunctions that are quite often needed? Thirty years ago, when I was in practice, when someone under the threat of attack—usually a woman—came to the office, she could see a partner in the legal firm under the green form legal aid scheme. How good it was then, to be able to be at court in 10 minutes, to get her some form of relief. However, all that disappears in areas where people cannot find access to justice.

Much of the change boils down to money. Legal aid rates have been held and cut in successive years. The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux has referred to legal aid as a postcode lottery. One in four bureaux apparently now operates in an "advice desert" and the availability of competent legal advice around the country is extraordinarily patchy. That is not a surprise—for the principal reason that legal aid rates have been cut dramatically, in real terms, in the past few years.

My father, who is 86, sent for a plumber a month ago. The plumber who turned up had travelled for an hour and was at my father's house for an hour before travelling home for another hour. My father paid £180 for that. Now, one might have thought that a solicitor's rate would be as good as a plumber's—far from it. My understanding is that a solicitor receives £12 an hour for travel and approximately £60 for the time spent with the client. In truth, there is heavier and heavier discouragement to lawyers to undertake legal aid work, and few are doing it. If fewer do it, who suffers? The poor, not the rich, suffer more than anyone else.

I have lost count of the number of times I have talked to solicitor friends who have said that one of their other major problems is the bureaucracy and form-filling that they must deal with all the time. Compliance audits and form-filling make for such a depressing life, they say, because they cannot spend enough of their time doing what they should be doing at a proper rate.

My advice to the Government is please ease up on solicitors' bureaucracy; please ensure that towns have properly paid local firms to give local advice; please make sure that everyone in the country has reasonably easy access to the courts; and please get across to the Home Secretary and other Ministers the fact that not all lawyers are bad, and that lawyer-bashing is not the answer to everything. Much of the answer is to respect the legal profession and try to send a message that it is appreciated, and, more importantly, needed in today's society.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Gareth Thomas) for securing this morning's excellent debate. We have had good contributions on access to justice and to courts.

I have a little time in which to deal with all the points that have been raised, but the issue is vital throughout the country, including rural areas. I am glad that it is the subject of this morning's debate and it is also important in urban and suburban areas. I represent an urban area, but I went to school in East Anglia and I remember small towns and villages such as Wisbech, Stamford, Eastry and Peakirk. Access to justice is vital in such areas, and I am glad that we have the opportunity to discuss it.

In legal terms, access to justice is not an abstract idea. We discuss it every month or so in this place in debates on health services, education, rural bus services and transport, but it is also important in the legal context. It can mean the difference between having a roof over one's head or being evicted, and between being properly defended in court or being wrongly sent to prison. It means receiving quality advice in the local citizens advice bureau. Access to justice is very important to many people living on the periphery, as my hon. Friend suggested, but it is also important to people who live in rural communities.

Only three or four years ago, access to justice was a hit-and-miss affair. It was unplanned and there was no real concept of the fair allocation of scarce resources. Since the introduction of the community legal service in 2000, however, we have begun to see the change that people need in their areas. The Legal Services Commission, which replaced the old Legal Aid Board, operates throughout England and Wales, and plans carefully to ensure that the most pressing needs for legal services are met first and that local voices are heard when assessing legal problems and issues.

It is important to state for the record that this debate relates to what the public think of as legal aid. Legal aid was a fantastic invention of the Attlee Government and an important contribution to the life of this country. It stands alongside universal education and universal health provision as a cornerstone of a civilised democracy.

I will talk about modern legal aid and the community legal service, but before I do so, it is right that I should spend a little time talking about court closures, which hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber have mentioned. Hon. Members will know that magistrates courts are managed locally by magistrates courts committees, which throughout the country comprise local people, as set out in the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. Each committee is solely responsible for the efficient and effective administration of magistrates courts in its area. Hon. Members will also know that local authorities sometimes dispute those decisions, which must be taken locally. If decisions are disputed, they may end up on the Minister's desk. Only then may a decision be taken to stop a court closure.

On 3 February, we had a very good debate, which the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) secured, on court closures in mid-Wales. Hansard recorded the debate, and I will not discuss it today. However, I want to put it on record that the Government strongly support the notion of local justice. The essential feature of local justice is that magistrates live or work in the locality, but it cannot follow that each community across the country will have its own courthouse. The Government can consider those matters if a local authority refers them to us.

Hywel Williams: Will the Minister give the Government's definition of locality?

Mr. Lammy: The hon. Gentleman knows that those issues depend on local circumstances. A unified courts service, towards which he knows we are progressing, will not only enable magistrates courts committees to deal with magistrates courts and the Court Service to deal with county courts, but allow local people to look locally to courts that are fit for purpose, can accommodate modern technology and ensure access for disabled people.

I want to clarify what the Government have done, although I do not want to be partisan. I am grateful that hon. Members have outlined the context, as 21 magistrates courts were closed in 1996 under the previous Administration, although that number diminished considerably in the last few years. In the last few months, Ministers have allowed appeals against court closures in London—Kingston, Sutton, Harrow, Barking and Dagenham—as well as in Grays, Aberystwyth, Caernarfon and Sutton Coldfield. We look at the circumstances and we are prepared to keep our courts open.

Mr. Heath: The difficulty for many of us is that a lot of magistrates courts committees formed the view that they were required, if not because of resource limitations then for some other reason, to "rationalise" their courts. Will the Minister give a clear undertaking that under the unified courts procedures, a key element underlying policy will be maintaining that service for and in the local community? If that element is present, we will start with the right basis for policy making at local level.

Mr. Lammy: Local justice must involve flexibility, which is key. Flexibility cannot mean that the Minister in Whitehall starts to tie people's hands over what happens locally. Decisions must be made locally, but if a local authority is unhappy with a decision it may come to a Minister's desk. The recent past demonstrates that we are able to stand up for local issues.

Let me move on, importantly due to the time available, to focus most of my remaining comments on legal aid. I have made two trips to Wales recently. I visited the Riverside advice centre and the headquarters of Shelter Cymru to see for myself the excellent ongoing work to address problems in Wales. I put on record the Government's thanks to the many legal aid practitioners across the country who do publicly-funded work on behalf of the taxpayer for poor people who really need that service. I know that there is a lot of debate about legal aid lawyers and I am afraid that there are areas of practice—I will not go into them today—in which we have not seen the quality that we have come to associate with legal aid lawyers. However, by and large, they do a tremendous service across the country.

The CLS budget has come a long way in a short time. Spending on legal help in Wales has increased from £9.3 million in 2001–02 to £11.4 million in 2002–03. Over the same period, CLS partnerships have spread rapidly across England and Wales, with more than 99 per cent. of the population now covered by a partnership. CLS partnerships bring together local funders and providers of legal services to help in the planning and development of local services. They do that by producing strategic plans that consider all aspects of need and provision in the area. Those plans are fully taken into account when the LSC makes its decisions on where the funding goes.

Let us be clear about what that means. We previously had advice services and legal aid lawyers throughout the country, but the service was patchy and uncoordinated—people did not know where to access it—until we introduced the CLS, which has set the standard with the quality mark provision and organised strategic plans for local areas. Of course, the needs in Wales will be different from those in my inner-London constituency. Until we introduced the CLS, uncoordinated legal services were provided ad hoc by lawyers, pro bono law students and advisers, but in 2000 this Government provided that co-ordination through the CLS. In Wales in particular, the Legal Services Commission is engaged in the CLS partnerships in all 22 local authority areas.

All that is encouraging, but, better still, it is good news for those who need good quality legal services. Quality is another major advance that the Government have brought to legal services. With the introduction of the CLS came the quality mark, in which I have believed strongly since I saw it taking shape in my constituency when I was a Back Bencher. The mark has meant that the poor and socially excluded people who need legal services can bank on their quality. Just because someone was sat behind a desk in a suit, it did not mean that they knew what they were saying, so I am glad that the Government have brought the quality mark to bear.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West spoke about gaps in provision in our local areas. The Legal Services Research Centre, which is the research arm of the LSC, recently published a report called "Causes of Action", which provides a lot of assistance in strengthening the CLS. It gives us the clearest picture yet of the legal problems that people face and of unmet need. The Government acknowledge that unmet need exists in our communities, and that we must ensure that people are getting advice at the right stage and from those who are appropriately trained.

We are running a family advice and information networks—FAINs—project with family law practitioners. It encourages lawyers to consider other local services such as social welfare, as well as the legal advice that they provide, to ensure that the vulnerable women who turn up at their practices are not directed solely down the legal path. I saw a FAINs project in Swansea, and those are the type of project that the Government want to continue with. That is why we commenced an independent review of the CLS, which is due to report in April.

The report will give us the opportunity to develop the CLS, building on its success and ensuring that we are dealing with any gaps. Comments were made on contracts, and we have also undertaken research on the development of the supply and purchasing of legal aid arrangements. We have done that because it is important for us to understand what is going on in our law firms and centres.

I have not been able to deal with all my hon. Friend's points, but I will write to him to cover them. I say to him also that where there is bureaucracy, I will seek to deal with it. I know that the LSC is ensuring that its next round of contracts is shorter, and I hope that he is pleased about that.

School Meals

11 am

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Health, particularly that of children, is currently a hot issue that is endlessly discussed in newspapers and magazines and on radio and television. The Government treat it seriously, and various Departments play their part: the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Department of Health, the Department for Education and Skills, the Food Standards Agency and dozens of other non-Government organisations across the country. I recognise the serious commitment of all those involved. A recent Food Standards Agency report linked children's diets with television advertising, and the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, my right hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich and West Norwood (Tessa Jowell) has asked the advertisers to consider their role. The Department of Health is currently examining the issue of food labelling, particularly where fat, salt and high sugar contents are involved. There can be no doubt about our common objectives.

I was particularly stuck to read recently about Sue Seabrook, a secondary school catering manager in Gloucester, who made the startling confession that for the last two years, she has been guilty of force feeding pupils with vitamins by surreptitiously adding pureed vegetables to their school dinners. She probably deserves a medal. Despite all the activity, our children's health continues to deteriorate, and obesity appears to rise almost in direct relation to the number of Government warnings about health and nutrition. In far too many areas, school meals have become virtually nutrition-free. The food value on the plate is about 35p, despite an average charge of £1.60. All too often the meal of the day is reheated pizza or burger and chips. Some staff and governors have argued that they do not pursue healthy eating in schools because feel no incentive to do so.

Let us consider what is happening. One in seven 15-year-olds and one in 12 16-year-olds are now so overweight that their health is already under threat. The long-term implications of lost school days, extra costs to the health service, and eventual loss of earning potential are catastrophic. We should be concerned not only with individual health problems, but with the growing problem of unacceptable behaviour in our schools. Studies in Spain have found that children with behavioural difficulties, such as attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, have low levels of vitamin B—folic acid—which is normally found in green vegetables and breakfast cereals. Many experts are now beginning to link the growth in ADHD with child nutrition.

Lord Winston wrote recently about the effect of good nutrition on behaviour, citing research from the USA and Oxford university. In one example, children were given nutritional supplements, which appeared to lead to a reduction in cognitive problems, behavioural problems and anxiety. Poor behaviour does not affect only the child who is behaving badly; it has a knock-on effect on every other child in the class. If the youngster is then excluded, that leads to further personal difficulties and adds to the overall cost of education without any discernable gain. If the youngster is then excluded, that leads to further personal difficulties and adds to the overall cost of education without any discernable gain.

I am conscious that poor nutrition is not recognised as a contributory factor to behavioural problems in our schools. I read in a recent DFES circular that the Department recognises that attendance and behaviour are fundamental and can make or break our school system. The circular went on to acknowledge that bad behaviour had a range of explanations and sources and that there was not a single quick fix but that there should be more tools in the box for staff and teachers to use.

It seems obvious that we need to try to do more to tackle such problems. If a youngster has a poor diet and is consuming products stuffed with highly refined sugar, it cannot be a great surprise that their attention span is poor and that their behaviour is characterised by a sudden energy rush followed by lethargy, lack of concentration and inattentiveness. There are already links between poverty, obesity and child behaviour. We provide free school meals for a great many children in this country. Would it not make sense to ensure the nutritional value of those meals?

Finland is often cited in debates such as this as a country that has sorted out school meals and exercise programmes for its youngsters. In so doing, it has tackled a great many health and behaviour problems. Someone recently suggested to me that the Finns are a biddable nation who accept expert advice and support Government measures put in place for their own good. I understand that in some Finnish villages it is common to compete to see which village can reduce overall cholesterol levels the fastest, and that schools regularly weigh pupils and advise parents if there is a problem with the youngster's weight.

Try as I might, I cannot see that happening here. We seem to be a population who revel in ignoring expert advice and resent being told how to behave. Choice is obviously important in our society, but offering a youngster a choice between chips and doughnuts and a tuna salad strikes me as a bit tricky. I have thought for some time that we should maybe persuade the big chain outlets to give the toys away with the apple and the salad rather than with the chips and chicken nuggets. I have tried to persuade my own children that they should think about that, but they are not desperately keen at the moment.

About 20 programmes are spread across the various Departments, all tackling issues of diet or nutrition aimed at children. In addition, we have health action zones, Sure Start, healthy living centres and others. To cite just one example, the New Opportunities Fund commitment of £42 million pounds for the national fruit scheme provides about 800,000 children with one piece of fresh fruit a day. I am told that that same money could provide about 26 million nutritious school meals.

Funding in this area across Departments—excluding local and regional programmes—is worth about £173 million. I wonder whether the time has come to have a serious debate on our children's health and to consider what proactive measures we could take. I would recommend a national audit of all the current funding. Personally, I think that we should explore the notion of free, nutritious school meals for all primary children. A poll on Channel 4's "Richard and Judy" programme yesterday showed that at least 70 per cent. of their viewers supported that idea.

At the very least we should ensure that the 2 million primary school children whose parents pay for school dinners or who already receive them free are guaranteed one healthy nutritious meal a day. I am not calling for blue skies thinking or excessive radicalism; rather, I am calling for a rational and sensible debate. We must recognise the huge long-term cost if we do not get to grips with such problems. School meals could be a vital tool in transforming our children's health and behaviour.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) on securing this debate, which, despite the absence of any other Member from any other party, is of great significance for all our constituents and our country. I welcome his call for a rational and sensible debate and I concur that it is vital that we have one. My hon. Friend referred at the beginning of his speech to the Government's clear commitment to promoting healthy eating and encouraging pupils to be physically active. An important part of fulfilling that commitment is a greater focus on physical education and sport in our schools.

It is essential that we practise what we preach about joined-up approaches to government at all levels. My hon. Friend referred to the different Departments and institutions that have an interest in making that objective a success, such as the Department for Education and Skills, the Department of Health, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the Food Standards Agency and external organisations. My hon. Friend's challenge, which is reasonable, is for each Department to have a coherent approach. He cited the example of advice from the Department for Education and Skills about attendance and the impact on children's behaviour of the diet and food options available in schools. I am sure that, like me, my hon. Friend has visited schools where teachers and governors have made that case powerfully, as have the children and young people themselves, in their meetings.

We spend a lot of money on children's health and it is vital that the money is used to the greatest effect. My hon. Friend talked about an audit of where the money is spent—I shall return to that at the end of my remarks. He described the national school fruit scheme, which is a £42 million scheme that is now funded through the New Opportunities Fund, but which will in future be funded by the Department of Health. The scheme followed the manifesto commitment, on which my hon. Friend and I were both elected in 2001, to provide a free piece of fruit each day to children between the ages of four and six. More than 1 million children now receive their fruit. The programme is under review and I understand that carrots are to be designated as a fruit, because the feedback that we have received suggests that they would be particularly popular, as well as nutritious.

From my visits as a Minister and as a constituency MP, I know that the scheme is popular. I remember knocking on a door in my constituency and meeting an eight-year-old girl who said that she was upset that the scheme applied to infant schools but not to her junior school. Her five-year old brother then appeared and said that he would be quite happy if the scheme did not apply to his school, because he was not keen on the fruit that he was getting. However, the feedback has been overwhelmingly positive. Some 99 per cent. of staff at schools that have been part of the scheme welcome and support it, and 97 per cent. of those schools say that it supports teaching and learning. Almost every school involved is in favour of continuing the scheme.

In learning lessons from that scheme, we need to consider the implications for our broader work. In my hon. Friend's closing remarks he talked about the possibility of free school meals for all primary age children. Kingston upon Hull city council was recently granted permission for precisely such a scheme. Free school meals will be introduced for primary age children in schools there. It will be interesting to consider the impact of that proposal and the take-up of the meals on the children's education, their health, and their behaviour. I shall be attending an event in Hull next week at which such proposals will be considered. Hon. Members will want to keep a close eye on how such schemes develop and to consider their implications for policy throughout the country.

It is critical that school meals have high nutritional standards. My hon. Friend rightly focused on the dilemma of choice and whether it was possible to provide a choice, and still to bring about a healthy outcome. I accept that that can be a tricky matter, but such decisions are best taken locally. I especially welcome what Hull has done, because it decided locally to introduce the free school meals scheme. Although there is clear guidance from the Government, the situation varies from school to school; we must ensure that the basic standard is higher than it is at present in some schools.

I am impressed by the schools that have successfully engaged with their pupils about the options that are available, with the result that they have healthier menus, contrary to what we might think about what pupils say they prefer. Recently, I visited Barking Abbey, a specialist sports college in the London borough of Barking and Dagenham, which decided to change its school meal contract and to source all its meals from a local organic farm, at no extra cost. That is most encouraging, as there will be a higher take-up by the pupils, who will have healthier options.

The Department for Education and Skills and the Food Standards Agency are undertaking a joint exercise involving about 80 secondary schools in England to consider the extent to which schools adhere to the standards. It is important to see whether schools are following the recommendations issued by the Department in "Healthy School Lunches—Guidance for Caterers on Implementing the Nutritional Standards". The study will also consider broader issues such as the dining room layout and space, lunchtime activities, vending machines—that is a big issue that has been subject to public debate—seasonal produce, and the nature of catering and contracts.

My hon. Friend asked us to look at the example from Finland in the context of strategies for primary schools, and several primary school heads have made the same suggestion. Selflessly, I have agreed to visit Finland and I undertake to look at school meals as well as primary school policy. I was very impressed by the quality of the food provided for primary-age children at a school that I visited in Madrid a couple of months ago. My hon. Friend cited evidence from Spain in his speech. We can learn from positive examples elsewhere in the world, as well as in this country.

My hon. Friend said that he was proposing not blue-sky thinking or extreme radicalism but simply getting the balance right. It has been suggested that some foods and vending machines should be banned, and there has been a broad public debate about such proposals. We are cautious about the matter, as such decisions are better taken by the head teacher and governors of the schools themselves. It has been suggested that vending machines could provide water and healthier food such as fruit, and we have a role in encouraging the take-up of those options.

I should like to say something about the broader role that education and schools can play in encouraging healthy living and healthy eating. Clearly, the curriculum itself has a part to play. While food and nutrition is not a discrete subject, there are many opportunities across the curriculum to encourage healthy living and an active lifestyle, for example through personal, social and health education in science and in food technology. We are constantly looking at ways in which we can ensure that these areas of the curriculum support the important work that is going on in that respect.

An area for which I have direct responsibility is personal, social and health education and citizenship education in our schools. An important part of that is encouraging healthy lifestyles and ensuring that healthy eating is embedded in the ethos of our schools. Five years ago, we launched the national healthy schools standard. I am impressed with the numbers of schools that have achieved that standard and the real enthusiasm that there is for it. I should like all our schools to sign up to that and to obtain a kite mark for being a healthy school both in terms of the food that they provide at lunchtime and, more broadly, their curriculum and wider work.

One subject on the school curriculum is the food and nutrition strand within design and technology. It is not compulsory, but I am pleased to report that it is growing in popularity, particularly among boys. Around 100,000 14 to 16-year-olds take GCSE food technology and we are investing an additional £500,000 in professional development for this important part of the school curriculum. We are also encouraging primary schools to consider this.

Finally, we have the food in schools programme, which is a joint programme between our Department and the Department of Health. The aim is to bring together the different initiatives, some of which my hon. Friend mentioned. We have been working with the British Nutrition Foundation and the Design and Technology Association to draw up guidance on establishing a whole school food policy that links together all the different aspects I have described, so that the messages that are available throughout the school are consistent.

A number of different projects have been set up including healthier breakfast clubs. Breakfast clubs can contribute to all of the outcomes that my hon. Friend rightly emphasised in respect of lunches. Healthier breakfast clubs can have the same impact on behaviour. Tuck shops and what is available there and through vending machines is another element. The availability of water also makes a difference to the health and behaviour of children. Other projects involve the dining room environment, cookery clubs and growing clubs for the outside areas. We are seeking to provide best practice and to learn from the best practice that is available in schools and communities across the country.

Last year my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a speech at the Institute of Public Health in which he announced that the Department for Education and Skills and the Department of Health would work together on a healthy living action plan. That plan is of critical importance. It enables us to learn from schools that are implementing successful whole school food policies and to look at what works and what does not. It gives us the opportunity, to which my hon. Friend alluded, to engage those who may be apathetic, uncertain or even resistant to these changes and to examine what motivates teachers, heads and governors in this respect.

The potential benefits to be gained from a healthy living action plan that brings together all the different resources in government, in schools, local communities and the wider world are well worth striving for. It will draw together the key areas of work from the different Departments to create a healthy living blueprint for improving pupils' diet and nutritional knowledge. That important work is under way, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear that it is a vital part of our work in the Department for Education and Skills. This is an important debate on a subject that is close to the hearts of all our constituents and hon. Members on both sides of the House. For that reason, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green for securing the debate, which will make an important contribution to the discussion as it progresses. I hope that we can engage hon. Members on both sides of the House and the wider public, so that we get things right and establish the very best practice with regard to healthy living and healthy meals in our schools and the broader education community.

Primary School Redundancies

2 pm

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this important matter today. I was prompted to seek this debate by the particular plight of one local school, Woodheys primary school, in Sale in my constituency. The problems to which I want to draw attention affect many of my local schools and many more around the country. Laura Daniels, the head of Woodheys, wrote this to the Minister for School Standards:

"At Woodheys we decided"— she was referring to last year—

"to set a realistic budget. Some heads 'balanced' their budgets by allocating negligible amounts to supply 'cover' or 'training' and have had to deny staff their entitlement to professional development. We did not. Also we refused to lose support staff at that late stage (it was July before we were given final information on our under or over spends from the previous year), and decided not to use Devolved Capital for buildings as we felt that although we had been given 'permission' by the government, this was not an avenue we supported. Also perhaps, naively, I believed that the government would rectify its mistake in 04–05. We were horrified to find that this has not happened. Against our principles and under pressure, as we only had until November 30th to change our decision, we have now decided to use Devolved Capital to 'clear' our deficit. Unfortunately, with no real increase in funding, we are back to 'square one' for September 2004. I have spent hours and hours agonising over an impossible task— I am supposed to give staff more support time, release and a better work/life balance (as promised by the government) and through no fault of my own or my governors, we will have to lose all support staff, many trained in-house, in September 04."

The Department for Education and Skills replied to Laura Daniels on 16 February, seeking to transfer blame to Trafford borough council. Trafford is a Labour-controlled authority, which has for two successive years been described as "weak" by the Audit Commission, so I am not altogether averse to some blame attaching to the local authority. The Department wrote:

"The Regulations governing LEAs' formulae, as I have said, still give LEAs a considerable measure of freedom to determine the detail of their formulae, so if your concern lies with the operation of Trafford's school funding formula, then you will need to follow-up matters at the local level."

This Government have taken massive powers to control the funds that local education authorities pass on to schools and the criteria by which funds are distributed between schools. Surely Ministers must therefore take some responsibility for the depressing picture of job cuts and service reduction that is beginning to emerge. However, instead of taking responsibility, they are showing complacency and giving excuses. Labour's 2001 manifesto promised explicitly that there would be more classroom assistants and claimed that primary schools' problems had already been tackled. It said:

"We plan a radical improvement in secondary schools", then, in bold print,

"building on our success in primary schools."

All the problems in the primary school sector had apparently been tackled in the first Parliament of the Labour Government, so it was time to move on to secondary schools.

The Chancellor, in his Budget statement last week, gave a similar impression that everything in the educational garden is rosy. He said:

"Having, in the last spending round, tackled under-investment in schools and in teaching staff, the primary focus of this spending round must be on excellence and improving standards for all."—[Official Report, 17 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 334.]

The picture that I have gained from my local schools is not one in which under-investment in schools and teaching staff has been tackled—far from it. Schools and parents will view the Chancellor's remarks in the light of their experience of last year's funding crisis. They saw, as we all did, that overall expenditure increased, but they also saw, owing to increased taxes, and especially employers' national insurance contributions, increased pension charges, the removal of much of the standards fund money, and changes in pay scales, that schools had less money to spend at the front line.

Last year, the National Union of Teachers commissioned Professor Alan Smithers and Pamela Robinson to research the effects of the crisis. Last October, they published their report, "The Reality of School Staffing", which showed that more than half of primary schools and nearly two thirds of secondary schools received less money than they had in the previous year, and that nearly a quarter of primary schools and a third of secondary schools had cut staffing levels. Smithers and Robinson found that schools throughout the country had lost 8,800 teaching posts, 5,500 of which were in primary schools, and 12,300 non-teaching staff.

Last year's crisis would have led to even bigger cuts had not Ministers belatedly urged the use of capital funds to stave off redundancies. Even then, schools were left with no reserves and no funding for necessary capital projects. Many schools were forced to set deficit budgets for the current year, and schools that face budget pressures this year that are the same as or worse than last year's have no reserves on which to call.

I shall illustrate the point with a letter that I received from St. Mary's Church of England primary school in my constituency. The head wrote:

"Last year, because of the change to the distribution of class size funding I had to lose 0.5 of a teacher. I was, because of careful budgeting the year before, able to fund 0.4 from my under spend. This year I am in a similar situation with no underspend."

Such schools face the loss of teaching staff.

The Minister will say that, in some areas, jobs will go in schools because of falling rolls. A recent survey in The Times Educational Supplement suggests that hundreds of teaching jobs will be lost this year. Primary schools are expected to bear the brunt of the losses. Professor Smithers has estimated that as many as 50,000 teaching jobs could be lost by 2010. However, we now have what Ministers have called an historic agreement on teacher work load. Even if rolls are falling, staff numbers need not decline if the Government intend to keep their promise to reduce class sizes and teacher work load and to increase the numbers of classroom assistants. Instead, we are looking at a picture of further redundancies as well as vacant posts being left unfilled.

For the teacher work load agreement to work, schools will need more staff, not fewer, but the Minister for School Standards apparently thinks that everything is fine. Asked in The Guardian on 13 January about how the plans were taking shape, he responded:

"How do I think it's going? Swimmingly well, swimmingly well."

The reality for schools, however, is often different, as the head of a Hale primary school told me:

"Finally I'd just like to add that as a relatively new Headteacher who has always aspired to this role I feel deeply let down by the workforce reform and the budget issues I am faced with on a day to day basis."

When the Prime Minister, no less, was in Manchester on 13 March, he advanced a new explanation for Labour's failures to deliver in our public services. He said that everything was wonderful—it is just that people think it is terrible. He said:

"There is much scratching of the head in political circles over this apparent paradox: people who feel personally optimistic in Britain; but collectively pessimistic. They say their own health care in the NHS is good; but the NHS in general is bad. Their schools are good; but education is bad."

One of the most important functions of the House is to keep Ministers, and perhaps especially the Prime Minister, in touch with reality. I shall do that by giving a snapshot of the views of primary school head teachers in my constituency.

I have already described the frustration felt by Laura Daniels, the head teacher at Woodheys. I shall share with hon. Members further comments that I received from a variety of primary schools in my area. The head teacher of an Altrincham school wrote to me on 12 March. He said:

"Confronted with advice from the DfES on increasing the number of classroom assistants and their profile across the school, I feel saddened, disappointed and disillusioned, whilst receiving funding that could not possibly meet the challenges set out by the DfES and current legislation.

Yesterday the school governors cut the hours by 40 per cent. of all classroom assistants and handed a redundancy notice to another. The working hours of one teacher were halved."

At a time when Ministers say that the work load of teachers should be reduced and staff numbers should be rising, staff numbers are actually falling, which will mean that work load will either stay at its current level or, in some schools, get worse.

The head teacher of All Saints Catholic primary school in Sale wrote to me, saying:

"Where vacancies have occurred, the Governors have taken clear decisions not to employ someone too expensive! Fortunately we have made good appointments, but we have actively discriminated against the elderly."

The funding pressures force schools to take staffing decisions that they regard as less than ideal. The funding crisis last year, and continuing pressures this year, mean that schools, instead of recruiting the teachers they think will be the best people to join their staff, will skew appointments towards the recruitment of less experienced, cheaper members of staff. At the other end of the scale, there are schools that already have long-serving members of staff, perhaps because they are the best schools and have the best working environments for teachers. Such schools, which have been successful in retaining their work force over a long period, will have a disproportionate number of older, more experienced teachers, and will face ever greater problems because the proportion of their school budget taken up by staff costs will be greater. The issue affects different schools in different ways, but in all those different scenarios it distorts the pattern of recruitment and creates problems, even in schools that are successful in retaining staff, which Ministers say is one of their principal priorities.

Another primary school head teacher in Sale wrote to me to say that the school faced a number of difficult issues this year, and that to resolve its budget difficulties it had been decided to "reduce teacher staffing by one full-time teacher from 31/8/04."

He said that that "does not involve redundancy as the teacher concerned is on a temporary contract".

Such job losses may not feature on the official returns of numbers of redundancies, because it is sometimes a matter of staff not being replaced, vacancies not being filled or contracts not being renewed, rather than of existing staff being made formally redundant.

The head teacher says that the school will also reduce its "Teaching Assistant support by the equivalent of one full-time post from 31/8/04."

and its

"Midday Supervision Staffing by at least two staff members; this will involve redundancy procedures."

He continues that the school will also

"reduce budget allocations to Curriculum Resources and Buildings Maintenance by 30 per cent. and 20 per cent. respectively from the 2003/4 levels."

The pressures that are being applied to the numbers and type of staff recruited and retained are being felt throughout the system, and they are affecting other areas such as service provision, curriculum resources, library materials and buildings maintenance, because schools are moving heaven and earth to try to ensure that they do not have to make staff redundant.

The head teacher of a local Roman Catholic school wrote:

"It is the Governors' decision not to immediately pursue a policy of redundancy, however it is clear that we cannot continue to maintain the current quality of educational provision . . . for another year given the current level of funding. We are clearly at breaking point with no other cuts or strategies to adopt."

Those schools have already weathered a crisis in the past 12 months, the like of which many in the education world had never seen. They have been through an incredibly difficult period, believing at every stage the Government's promises that things would be better this year, that new resources would be in place, and that there would be a guaranteed funding increase to deliver them from their difficulties. However, there is nothing to help schools that plunged into deficit budgets last year and face continuing pressures this year.

The head teacher of another Sale school wrote to me:

"Although I will not have to make redundancies this year, I may not be replacing one teaching assistant who is leaving in September and will be using all of our reserves to make ends meet."

That school is perhaps fortunate, because it still had some reserves after the difficulties of last year. A vast number of schools that had run their finances prudently and maintained some reserves to help them in difficult times were forced to spend all that money to stave off redundancies last year, and they now have nothing left to cover current and future difficulties.

[Mr. Graham Brady]

The head teacher of another local school, this time in Timperley, wrote:

"Trafford have stated that the"

school's

"budget has been well managed. Savings in the Special Purposes Fund resulted in £73,000. Governors intended that this fund be used to supplement the budget during the years of falling pupil numbers. £33,000 was used to balance the budget in 03/04. The remaining £40,000 will be used in 04/05, but will not achieve a balanced budget."

Again, we see the problems that existed last year, and that the Minister assured everyone would be resolved adequately this year, continuing into the future.

"Even without falling rolls . . . we would be unable to maintain current staffing levels without additional funding."

Current staffing levels cannot be maintained, let alone the increases in the support staff and classroom assistants that the Government promised and that Ministers know are essential if their promises to tackle work load difficulties and meet the work load agreement are to be fulfilled.

"From September 2004 we will have large, vertically grouped classes in most age groups, with many accompanying issues for staff and parents."

Again, we can see the ramifications for the quality and nature of education provision: not only the loss of valued staff but further difficulties as schools create different strategies to deal with the problems that arise.

The general secretary of the National Association of Head Teachers, David Hart, said:

"In some areas April's budgets will be like applying a sticking plaster to a gaping wound."

The Chancellor has promised a direct payment to each school in 2005–06, but that will not do anything to help this year. Even if the sticking plaster is big enough for the following year, it will have done nothing to prevent redundancies and job cuts this September.

We must ask why, faced with last year's devastating problems and continuing pressures this year, the Chancellor did not promise support this year in his Budget statement but held it out as a prospect for future additional help. Heads around the country are becoming somewhat sceptical about promises of future funding, because all too often, even when the overall expenditure is increased, the costs that heads have to bear—staff costs, additional tax costs or extra bureaucratic costs—increase by more than the additional funding.

Ministers must accept that thousands of schools across the country have dire problems. The Prime Minister must understand that the paradox puzzling parents is that they pay more tax and the Government are spending more money, but the outcome in schools is teachers facing the sack. Schools do not want to hear from the Minister that everything is perfect, because they know that it is not; they want him to understand that there is a problem. They want to hear, as do I on behalf of schools in my constituency that have written to me, practical proposals to stop the loss of good, experienced teachers and classroom assistants in September.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I was considering participating in the debate this morning, but I have a confession for this Chamber and the country: I am ill. However, I intend to fight the illness and continue as leader of the Welsh Liberal Democrats for now. Sadly, the media have not shown the slightest interest in the condition of my health, but my lines are open and I am waiting for "Newsnight" to call. Nevertheless, I put on record my gratitude for my leader, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), for passing the torch of illness to a new generation of politicians, and I shall do my best to gain political mileage from it.

Redundancies caused by primary school closures are an issue in my constituency. I realise that the Minister is not directly responsible for matters in Wales and can therefore relax, but I will ask him a general strategic question on which I hope he can give his perspective. I shall describe the specific issue in my constituency that brings me to the debate. Over the past few years, Powys county council, which oversees education in Montgomeryshire, has considered various school closures, and some schools have been closed. Most recently, five schools were considered: Llangurig, Llandinam, Llanrhaeadr, Llansilin and Llangedwyn. One could think that all schools beginning with a double 'l' were chosen, but I suspect that there was more strategy to it. The bottom line is that each individual committee felt it wrong to close those schools and cause redundancies in the teaching community, for various reasons.

A fractious series of debates and arguments culminated in a debate in Powys county council in which, breathtakingly, the then chief executive sought to criticise me in front of all the councillors for seeking to lobby them in support of the schools. I respectfully point out that that is my job. Nevertheless, that shows how high emotions were. I am glad to say that all those schools have had a reprieve, except for Llangedwyn, which remains under review.

That brings me to my analysis of the redundancy difficulties caused in my constituency, which are relevant to the whole situation in England, as outlined by the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) in his excellent introductory speech. The redundancies are bad from an educational perspective, especially in primary schools in rural areas, because the schools are the heart of small communities and in some senses embody the soul of the community. If we close down the school and fire the teachers, we also close down much of the community's social focus.

Those redundancies also have a knock-on effect on the economy. The decelerator effect of taking a primary school out of a rural community can often lead to a reduction in population and a disincentive for young families to move to the area. The result is economic pressure on the shops and trading outlets in those villages, which oftentimes pay the price as well. That is a new, additional observation that I seek to raise with the Minister: redundancies caused not directly by cuts in the education budget but indirectly, by population reduction and deterioration in the economic viability of a community.

I could at this stage make known my criticisms of the Government for attacking councils that have introduced large council tax increases to mitigate what they regard as extremely difficult financial circumstances brought about by Government policy. However, I shall not do that, because that is not the core issue for this debate. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West sought guidance from the Minister on why money has increased in real terms but genuine cuts have been made. The explanation is the ring-fencing of much of the money. It is laudable that teachers have received a better financial settlement in the majority of cases, in order to right the continuous underfunding and reduction of salaries in the teaching community under the Conservatives, but using up the increased pot of money entirely in teachers' pay settlements will not help with the infrastructure or maintain the number of teachers.

My considerations about what could be done next apply to England as well as Wales, and I shall be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about them. We must obviously consider the educational impact of redundancies caused by downsizing or closing schools. Taking a primary school out of a community clearly has a knock-on effect. I personally believe that the most effective way to teach citizenship is in small local schools, with community support, where real relationship building can take place and inculcate values by osmosis. Both cuts in the teaching work force and school closures, which lead to redundancies, should be considered in the light of the economic knock-on effects that I have described.

There is an interesting implication of my analysis. If I am correct, it should sometimes be appropriate for money that is earmarked for economic activities to be used to support a primary school in a rural area, because the economic cost of not doing so far exceeds the saving to a local authority.

Mr. Brady: The hon. Gentleman might want to reflect on the fact that the Government accept his argument when it comes to regenerating urban areas, where they are happy for additional money to be spent, but apparently reject it for rural areas.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman makes an insightful point. Some of us have felt for some time that, despite considerable talk of rural-proofing, there are double standards in the treatment of inner-city areas and rural areas such as Montgomeryshire. No doubt he is familiar with rural circumstances himself.

I seek confirmation that the Minister takes the economic impact of school closures seriously and that, strategically at least, he would recognise that there is an economic case to be considered in decisions to downsize teaching work forces or proceed with school closures that might lead to large-scale redundancies. For my part, I shall fight, fight and fight again to save the schools in Montgomeryshire, which I love. I hope that the Government's support for the strategic considerations that I have described will be a useful indicator for the decision makers in Welsh education policy, and also a reassurance to rural areas in England.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): May I express the hope from the Chair that the hon. Gentleman recovers from whatever is ailing him? He tipped me off this morning that he was suffering from a disease that is new to me, called Kennedyitis. I hope that the epidemic sweeping his party is not too debilitating for him or any of his colleagues.

Lembit Öpik: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is sure to be bogus, but I will accept it.

Lembit Öpik: If one of the consequences of the affliction is a conversion to Liberal Democracy, you can expect that many more people in the House will contract it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that hon. Members have noted what the hon. Gentleman says.

Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on securing this debate. It is undoubtedly an important issue and has a big impact on our communities, demoralising teaching staff and causing them extra stress when they are already in stressful situations. In my constituency, certainly, parents are now desperately worried about the reorganisation that is being discussed. The issue is incredibly important, and the focus on primary schools is another vital aspect. The population bubble is moving into secondary schools, taking more funds and making it even harder to sustain a good teaching ratio in our primary schools.

I acknowledge at the outset the difference that the Government have made to our schools—it would be remiss not to. Up to two years ago, the teachers in my constituency were beginning to see a real difference. There was a sea change. I shall refer a little to my own constituency, although I know that this is a winding-up speech, simply because one of the two local education authorities there, Poole LEA, is the lowest-funded primary school authority, so some points are relevant.

Sadly, we have to take last year's settlement as our starting point. That is clearly where things started to go badly wrong. At long last, it has been accepted as a crisis that saw hundreds of teachers made redundant across the country and many temporary contracts for both teachers and learning support assistants not renewed. One survey showed that one in five primary schools increased their class sizes as a result, which is the contrary direction to that in which we wish to go. We saw the introduction of a new funding formula, plus the significant increase in costs falling on schools. It all happened at the same time. The increased national insurance contributions and teachers' pay and pension increases were all incredibly predictable, but it would appear that civil servants failed to research accurately the impact of such changes.

I seem to recall that at first Ministers were in denial, trying to blame LEAs for not passporting funds to schools. Undoubtedly, some misdeeds were flushed out, but at the end of the day not enough money was provided. That created extreme problems for many authorities, and especially those with low funding such as those in my constituency.

[Mrs. Annette L. Brooke]

The debate over who was at fault was blame culture at its worst. The crisis in funding was a setback in the considerable progress made by this Government, resulting in demoralisation for many teachers and head teachers while childish squabbling went on nationally. As we have heard from other parts of the country, and I am sure that it is pretty widespread, many schools minimised the impact of last year's poor settlement by using up balances or dipping into their capital reserves.

The improved settlement this year for many LEAs was not sufficient to make up that deficit. In many authorities, the problems are compounded by falling rolls. In Poole, the key group of workers facing redundancy were learning support assistants, many more of whom went than teachers last year. In that small education authority, 46 lost their jobs, partly as a result of falling rolls and partly because of the unfair education settlement for 2003–04, which favoured some parts of the country above others.

The survey to which the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West referred was commissioned by the National Union of Teachers, and the Department for Education and Skills questioned some of its findings. One of the survey's conclusions was that head teachers and senior staff in primary schools would have to do more teaching, which is substantiated by schools in my constituency.

I quote a first-school head, who has met the Minister for School Standards several times, which I welcome, as that head teacher can explain what it is like being head of a small first school in the lowest-funded primary school authority in the country. She said:

"At the end of 2003 we lost a full-time teacher and 47 hours of teacher assistant time. In order to attempt to set a balanced budget we have replaced a retiring member of the school leadership team with a newly qualified teacher. This means that our leadership team will consist of only 2 others and myself to lead the teaching and learning for the school. This will put great pressure on us as we are so thinly spread. Our supply and staff-training budgets have been slashed. My SENCO relies on me, the head teacher, to give her non-contact time to carry out her role. I also give each staff member an afternoon of planning and preparation time each term, though this is not enough, of course. All these hidden stresses mean that in real terms we are a great deal worse off now than in 2002/3 and all staff are extremely tired through trying to compensate for the deficiencies in funding."

Many other schools in Poole are predicting compulsory redundancies this year because the percentage increase in funding in an already inadequate budget has just not lifted schools up to where they were before.

I have talked to various local education authorities. A councillor in Oxfordshire said:

"While we are not facing a huge drop in primary numbers due to housing growth, we still face severe budget problems from last year's settlement. This year's settlement has kept us stable from last year's position but has not made up all of last year's gap. The key factor in that gap was and is teacher pay reforms, which have never been properly funded."

We acknowledge that the Government swiftly took action for this year, introducing the guaranteed minimum increase in funding, restoring money to the standards fund—it would have been dreadful if that had been removed—and introducing payments for the worst-affected authorities, but many authorities just missed the additional help, and Poole was one of them.

As falling rolls begin to bite, the threat of redeployment or redundancy will increasingly become a fact of life for teachers in many parts of the country. The Department for Education and Skills predicts that schools will lose more than 600,000 pupils between 2001 and 2016, which on the present pupil-teacher ratio is equivalent to about 41,000 teachers.

The Times Educational Supplement survey showed that schools in most of England's 150 local authorities would shed staff this year. It is difficult to imagine that anything will reverse the demographic trends—it will take more than power cuts—so we need to look forward and consider how they can be managed.

Liberal Democrats favour the local management of schools and local decision taking, but as a consequence, the way in which redundant teachers are treated varies tremendously across the country. In some areas, there appear to be deals with unions, but in others teachers are on their own in finding jobs. I have great sympathy with the teachers, who may include my daughter, as she is likely to be affected by what happens in the next four years. It is a sensitive matter that should not be subject to dictation from the centre, but it is difficult for the teaching profession to handle the differentials.

It is important to note that the decline in school rolls does not hit all areas in the same way, even in the same authority. In Poole, the drop has been sharpest in the old council house estates. That is a result of the policy of selling council houses, which means that families remain in their houses long after their children have grown up, so new, younger families cannot move in.

Commendably, the Government want to see joined-up services and extended schools, which I am in favour of, at the heart of such communities, but that will be impossible if existing schools close, so local education authorities face a choice: if communities are to be sustained in the face of falling rolls, key schools must be kept open and schools redefined as providers of a wide range of services to the community. If we can focus on that, the outcome could be very positive.

Councils must be allowed to be creative, but that will be impossible if market forces dominate and popular schools are allowed to grow at the expense of all others. That relates rather well to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who is suffering greatly, and who, I hope, is not spreading his germs in this direction. He referred to the economic impact of the closures and the fact that we need to support rural primary schools. I come across such rural issues in my mixed constituency, and I have great sympathy for his points. It is interesting that they are reflected among schools on council house estates. Indeed, the issue is exactly the same.

At the moment, everyone is talking about improving the protection of vulnerable children, and schools will undoubtedly play a vital role in ensuring that every child matters. As part of an excellent scheme in Poole, pastoral support workers are appointed to cover a pyramid of schools or a specific school. Those workers are ideally placed to link up with health and social services staff to co-ordinate services to children and parents. I am sorry to say, however, that cuts to learning support funds have put the position of those workers at risk. Of course, we now have the work force reform programme, which is much spoken about. I have not seen much evidence of it in my constituency, but that is because I have not visited any of the pathfinders, which are further along the line. It is also true that schools are now tackling the 24 tasks. However, learning assistants are still losing their jobs. They are the very people who should be doing jobs such as photocopying to make life better for our teachers and to allow them to concentrate on using their skills to the utmost.

I must tell the Minister about a meeting that I attended with Poole head teachers, just as the real severity of last year's settlement was hitting them. The LEA suddenly announced that it had been given a grant of £18,000 or more to devise a work reform strategy. I do not know how those head teachers stayed sitting in the room—they were so incensed about the fact that they had to make redundancies while a grant had been given to devise a strategy. Of course, they want work reform, but it is ironic that they face the prospect of working longer hours and asking others to do so. It is important that we get the balance right. We all want teachers to be given the non-contact time that they desperately need, and we need to use the opportunity provided by falling rolls. We must ensure that things do not get worse as schools get into a downward spiral because they do not have enough money. The 32 pathfinders have been given extra resources. What additional resources will be provided across all LEAs for work force reform? How will that tie in with falling rolls in some authorities?

Many trade unions have said that falling school rolls offer opportunities. For example, parents will have greater certainty about whether their preference for their child's school place can be met. There is greater scope for the removal or replacement of poor-quality or temporary accommodation, and other surplus accommodation can be used to support community initiatives in the extended schools. There is a good opportunity to reduce class sizes, which authorities cannot often do because the Government dictate the money flows to the schools and pressurise them to eliminate surplus places. The Government cannot do anything about the falling rolls, but they can allow greater flexibility locally to find good solutions that will benefit our young people, their future and our future. Redeploying more money into early-years education is possible.

Islington councillors made the interesting comment that inflexible compulsory requirements from the Department for Education and Skills have had unhelpful and distorting effects on the ground. For example, the requirement that no school should receive less money next year than last year cuts right across coherent three-year strategies. This is an example of a uniform national requirement having perverse effects because it does not take local factors into account. I do not know the full situation, but the councillors make the important point that so much has been dictated from the centre. I understand why, and I have seen schools that have benefited from such a strong-arm approach, but it is now time to let the LEAs and the schools work out the best local solution. Will there will be any slackening off?

Councillors from Milton Keynes made a point that is not key to the debate, but I have been asked to mention it and will do so as there is time: the school population of Milton Keynes is rising, but schools are still suffering. It is worth examining this converse situation, because the councillors say that the Government funding formula does not provide for that rising school population. Almost all their grant is swallowed by passporting to schools, but it does not cover the rising demand. It seems that everyone is unhappy, but I wanted to make that point. I was interested to read that the Department is responding to the problem of the falling primary school rolls, and that there is a proposal to establish a working group with partner organisations to explore the options and opportunities available to schools and communities. I will be interested to see how that works out.

When the Government announced the percentage terms and individual grants to secondary and primary schools, it all sounded as if there was a lot of money. There is, however, a lack of trust about whether all this money really exists and what it will mean. In my part of the world, people are never very happy when percentage increases are mentioned. Cash grants to schools would, in many ways, be more helpful. The percentage of a small base does not provide enough money. Moving to the new formula was a contributory factor, but the Government always said that it would not be revised in the first few years. What plans do the Government have for monitoring and adjusting that formula? It has been said many times before that LEAs throughout the south-west are suffering under the formula because of the bizarre situation of low wages outside the public sector, in which wages are high, and very high house prices. It is therefore very difficult for teachers to move, which we want the formula to take into account. It makes no sense that one area receives more money than another area a few miles away when there is no difference in the cost of living.

All in all, there are opportunities, but the situation worries many people in the profession and parents who are concerned about their children. I hope that the Minister will give us a positive answer. We know that he cannot control falling rolls, but there is much that he could do to mitigate the effects. I agree with the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West that we do not want to hear that everything in the country is hunky dory, as it is not.

2.50 pm

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), as a veteran of school funding debates, on opening the debate in such magnificent style. He highlighted two aspects of the matter: its historical background—he set out a macro-picture of the cause of the current school funding crisis; and the impact of that crisis on the quality of education, which he eloquently described, with particular reference to schools in his constituency and the decisions that they are taking about funding and teacher recruitment.

My hon. Friend was right to point out that 8,800 teaching posts and 12,300 non-teaching posts were lost last year. It is noticeable how many schools took the difficult decision last year to lose staff—both teaching assistants and teachers—and how much poorer those schools are for having done so. I know that many hon. Members can tell of similar examples from their constituencies of problems that are the consequences of redundancies in primary schools.

[Mr. Mark Hoban]

I am grateful that there is a cordon sanitaire between us and the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who is suffering some ailments; he outlined the concerns of many hon. Members about the impact of falling rolls, particularly in rural areas, and described the threat that they pose to valued rural schools, which offer a great deal of amenity to their local communities—they are often their lifeblood.

The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) seemed to advocate a policy of selective power cuts on council estates to restore numbers in the schools in her constituency. I am fully aware of the problems there, for which she made a powerful case, since I visited Poole and met the excellent Conservative leader of the borough council, and the executive member for education. They have done a great deal to raise the profile of problems in Poole. As well as meeting me and my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), they met the Minister for School Standards to raise their concerns.

I was delighted to have an opportunity to go to Poole, to meet the director of education and visit a couple of schools, so that I could understand at first hand the impact of relatively low LEA settlements on schools. In classrooms that I visited in my constituency in Hampshire, not that far along the coast, I saw the significant difference that a relatively small funding difference can generate in schools. Poole is suffering because it has relatively few areas of deprivation compared with the rest of the country, and does not receive the area cost adjustment that I believe the neighbouring authority of Bournemouth has. That clearly has a big impact on education.

I spoke to a head teacher who raised the same question as the hon. Lady about what happens when money from a Government initiative runs out and schools want to continue to support the employee who was recruited because of that initiative. The pastoral workers who have been recruited in Poole schools are clearly very highly valued by head teachers, who see them as a way of resolving several issues and improving learning. However, it is clearly difficult when central Government funding for that is withdrawn. How is the funding to support the post to be made up? That is particularly difficult in an LEA where there is little headroom as a consequence of the starting point of the financial settlement. The points about that were well made.

It is also clearly important to reduce the number and complexity of funding streams that schools must deal with. I was interested to talk to a group of heads in the primary school sector in Nottinghamshire recently. They applied for funding for a project and were told that they should have had a bid writer to help them prepare their bid. That would have meant diverting valuable resources from the classroom to appoint a consultant simply to secure additional funding for schools in the area.

It is appropriate to engage in this debate as we come to the end of March and the schools' financial year 2003–04. It is also timely to look forward to the next financial year. We are all clear as to the causes of last year's funding crisis. We are familiar with the means by which the Government have gone about trying to solve it for the 2004–05 financial year with the minimum per pupil guarantee of 4 per cent. and the transitional funding for some schools in some LEAs.

The letters that I have received from LEAs show that there are two important concerns about the upcoming financial year. First, there is a hangover from the 2003–04 financial year. As we have heard in the debate, many schools used their reserves to balance their books for this year and have set deficit budgets in the hope that things will get better. Those schools are now reaching a point where they wonder whether they can continue those measures in the 2004–05 financial year or whether they need to take tough decisions this year to solve their funding problem. Then there is the issue of work force reform, which has been touched on in all the speeches so far. How can we deliver the promises to classroom teachers if the funding is not there to employ support assistants to enable them to have more non-contact time?

Let me quote some of the responses that I have received from LEAs about the school funding crisis. Essex county council has delivered to its schools the 4 per cent. per pupil increase and it says that the average school should be able to meet the cost of inflationary pressures on the school budget in 2004–05. Most LEAs are in the same position. They believe that the Government's increase is sufficient to meet this year's cost pressures. Essex county council points out, however, that there are 34 schools in Essex with accumulated deficits totalling some £4 million. It believes that schools have used £18 million of their reserves to fund recurrent expenditure.

The Government, recognising this use of deficits and reserves to balance the books across all schools, primary and secondary, have given certain LEAs transitional funding. Essex has received only £9.8 million of transitional funding, which is clearly not enough to cover the reserves that have been used and the deficits that have been created in the 2003–04 financial year. Those schools that have used their reserves or have set deficit budgets will have difficult decisions to make in 2004–05.

That fact has not escaped the Essex NUT spokesman, Mr. Jerry Glazier, who said:

"These latest settlements just compound the problems. Clearly they are not nearly adequate to meet the financial demands on schools, especially with extra pressures faced by the workload agreements. The crisis is most certainly not over, not by a long way."

It is perhaps not surprising that the Secretary of State for Education and Skills has decided not to grace the NUT conference with his presence this year, arguing that he has better things to do.

The director of education in Bromley said:

"Evidence from individual schools is that the guaranteed funding level may not be sufficient to maintain school resources . . . at the current level. As at 31 March 2003"— this shows the scale of the problem and its deterioration over the course of the last year—

"Bromley had 11 primary schools with a total deficit or £295,000."

It is estimated that at the end of March 2004, 16 primary schools will have a total deficit of £716,000. Based on the allocation of the transitional grant to Bromley, he considers the £1.8 million that has been allocated insufficient to cover the deficits and the use of reserves.

In Bedfordshire, another authority expressing concern over the future, the county education officer says:

"I am aware that some schools are already expressing concern over not being able to balance their budgets without making reductions . . . A wider issue however, is whether the Government will be able to sustain these levels of funding in future years. A major area of concern here is the pressures associated with the full implementation of the workforce reform proposals over the next two years."

I have heard of at least one school that had to make teachers redundant in order to employ learning support assistants to meet the work force reform commitments. Our schools are facing a dreadful situation.

The Minister is responsible for education in London, so he will be interested to know that the chief education officer for Barnet, in a letter to me, said:

"the LEA has managed to ensure that the schools' budget shares will rise by 5.8 per cent. The Government's assessment of the inflation pressures on schools is 3.4 per cent., but we believe that this is an underassessment of the costs of implementing single status and workforce reform. This leaves insufficient funds to redress the budget gap from 2003–04 . . . Most of our schools have had to make savings in 2003–04, and many will have to make further savings in 2004–05 and 2005–06, to ensure they are able to balance their budgets in future years."

The initial impact of the Government's financial settlement, which we saw in the financial year 2003–04, will continue this year and next year. As the chief education officer goes on to say:

"Most of our schools' budgets consists of salaries, so it is inevitable that much of the savings will consist of staffing."

That is yet a further indication that there are more redundancies to come in our primary schools.

I also received a letter from the chief education officer for the London borough of Camden, in which he states:

"We anticipate that the transitional Grant will enable us to reduce the level of deficits in 2004/5. Our ability to continue this . . . into 2005/6 will depend on our then settlement and any further transitional protection. I do not believe that the level of funding will enable schools to replace the balances used during 2003/4 and 2004/5."

The picture seems to be similar across the whole of London. The borough of Enfield, in which the Minister will take a particular interest, is making an early bid for support in the financial year 2005–06, as shown in a letter that I received. It states:

"We are concerned about funding in future years including the additional costs that will arise from the next stage of implementing workforce reforms, the turbulence that may arise if pay and performance grants are mainstreamed in 2005/06 and the funding of the outer London teacher pay award that has been mooted for September 2005. We are also anxious to ensure that Enfield receives transitional support funding in 2005/06."

That is a clear indication, from the Minister's own authority, that problems will emerge in the future.

Lest any part of the country should feel neglected, let me turn to Portsmouth, which neighbours my local authority. Members of Portsmouth city council recently went to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to ask for more funding. The complexity of the Government's funding and the impact that it has on individual authorities comes out very clearly in the reported concerns for Portsmouth. On Thursday 18 March, Portsmouth newspaper, The News, reported that "an additional gift of £891,000 given by the government last year to meet a shortfall has been taken out of this year's budget."

The LEA must recover £900,000 from this year's budget, but it is a small authority with challenging schools and difficult circumstances—although it is making progress.

The impact of the shortfall can be seen in several primary schools in Portsmouth. The News reports:

"St. George's Beneficial C of E Primary School in Old Portsmouth lost seven assistants and Stamshaw Junior School was forced to axe two posts."

Across the whole of Portsmouth—with an LEA of 140,000 electors—some 40 learning support assistants were lost. That is a big reduction in an area that has many difficulties. Therefore, even when LEAs make great efforts—as the Portsmouth authority has—to improve behaviour in schools and to find innovative ways to tackle truancy and bad behaviour, they find that central Government do not give money to support those initiatives.

As I hope to have illustrated using those letters from LEAs, the prospects for 2004–05 are bleak in many schools, particularly those that set deficit budgets last year or used their reserves to safeguard the education of the children in their care. Although this year's spending pressures have been met from the settlement, the transitional grant is not sufficient to offset the use of reserves and deficits last year. If the transitional funding is not enough, how else will primary schools that used their reserves and set their deficit budget balance their books this year, other than by reducing their biggest cost—staff? Is there any light at the end of this tunnel?

The Chancellor announced in the Budget last week that education spending in the next spending round will rise by 4.4 per cent. in real terms. However, he failed to mention that this represents a tightening, compared with an increase in real terms of 6 per cent. in the current spending round. We are seeing a reduction in the rate of growth of spending on education across all schools in the next spending round. To put that into context, we are seeing work force reforms—many people doubt that they are adequately funded—on the basis of current spending plans, together with a combination of greater demands on schools' work forces and the need to recruit more learning support assistants. Will those demands be met from within the lower rate of increase forecast by the Chancellor for spending on schools in real terms in last week's Budget? I cannot see how primary schools will achieve that necessary reform without an improvement in spending.

My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West mentioned the £55,000 for an average primary school that was promised by the Chancellor last week, and we must be clear what that promise means. Is it an extra £55,000 for the average primary school, or an increase in the standard sum that primary schools already receive, to take them up to £55,000? I heard a few comments last Friday in my constituency that led me to believe that teachers think they will receive an extra £55,000. That is what they hope for, but I suspect that the reality is that the average primary school will receive an increase up to £55,000. We must clarify that today, given the importance of funding to all schools, and especially primary schools.

There is another factor on which we have not yet touched. The cause of this spending crisis was the way in which the Government decided to reallocate money among the LEAs, a decision announced to the House in November 2002. The full effects of the funding system of floors and ceilings have yet to work their way through to LEAs. Some authorities, such as Barking, will lose up to £1 million; Bexley will lose up to £3.3 million; Kent up to £36.6 million; Enfield up to £4.5 million. Those are all figures that have been provided to me in written parliamentary answers by the Minister here today, or by the Minister for School Standards. In total, those local authorities and other LEAs are set to lose more than £166 million as the funding formula works its way through to fruition. When will it happen? We know that schools have been given a stay of execution until the other side of the general election, or the other side of the 2005–06 spending round, as Ministers prefer to put it—being a slightly cruder politician than some Ministers, I prefer to talk about the general election. However, once those spending reductions work their way through to those LEAs that are set to lose, there may well be a further round of redundancies in our primary schools.

It is clear that the funding crisis of 2003–04 will have repercussions, not just in 2004–05 but in 2005–06. It is also clear that such problems will be compounded by the introduction of work force reforms at a time when the Chancellor feels able to reduce the rate of growth of education spending. I fear that the combination of such circumstances will put many more jobs at risk in primary schools and the redundancies that we have seen over the last 12 months will merely be the start of worse to come.

3.9 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): We have had a good debate, and I join others in congratulating the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on securing the debate, and on his reappearance. He is a fellow veteran of schools debates in this place over last year, and it is good to see him back—though in a different place to where he was before. A number of important points have been raised during the debate, and I shall do my utmost to respond to as many of them as I can, but give my usual undertaking that if I fail to do so in the 20 minutes left, I shall respond to hon. Members' specific points in writing.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) on his contribution and wish him better health. I congratulate his Front-Bench colleague, the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke), on apparently being the only Liberal Democrat Member to be in good health at the moment.

This is a serious and important debate, and I was pleased when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education invited me to take responsibility for work with primary schools. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West quoted the 2001 Labour party manifesto, which said that we would seek to build on our success in primary schools. I do not regard that statement as meaning that somehow everything that needed to be done had been done. Rather, it recognised the real progress that primary schools made between 1997 and 2001, as measured most notably by the improvements in literacy and numeracy.

There was a strong commitment to build on those improvements with regard to literacy and numeracy and the broader school curriculum. We therefore published last May the document entitled "Excellence and Enjoyment", which has been broadly welcomed in the primary sector, both for its reaffirmation of the core challenge of literacy and numeracy in primary schools and for its celebration of the broader school curriculum. I have no doubt that in addressing the need to build on that success, we must also recognise how crucial it is to invest in school buildings, equipment and staff. That is why this debate on redundancies in primary schools is of great relevance.

Let me say a word or two about the broader situation in Trafford. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West spoke, quite rightly, about his constituency and raised legitimate areas of concern. He is corresponding with my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards about Woodheys school, but he will acknowledge that Trafford has seen a very significant improvement in staff numbers in schools since 1997. I am told that teacher numbers in Trafford increased from 1,750 in January 1997 to just over 2,000 in 2003—a 15 per cent. increase—and there has been an even bigger increase in the number of school support staff. That is the context for the events of recent years, about which the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole spoke.

There has been a real improvement since 1997. The hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that that is reflected in the very high standards that are seen in schools in Trafford, which I am sure he would want to join me in celebrating. We estimate that between 1997–98 and 2004–05, the funding per pupil in Trafford will have increased by 31 per cent. We have also seen a significant improvement in capital investment in schools in Trafford, as we have in other parts of the country. Of course, I do not suggest, and I have not suggested in previous debates, that everything is perfect or, as the hon. Lady put it, hunky-dory. We face a number of challenges. I shall do my best to address some of them and, in particular, some of the points that were made in the debate.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire made a thoughtful speech in which he addressed one important aspect of the debate—teachers' pay. For years, this country has failed properly to recognise and recompense teachers. Part of the cost pressure that has resulted in some of the difficulties—I emphasise that—relates to the fact that we are starting to give teachers the levels of pay that they should be receiving. As several colleagues have said, that can result in 80, 85 or even 90 per cent. of the budgets for some schools going on staffing costs. That factor has definitely come into play in the difficulties that we have had over the past year.

The hon. Gentleman made another interesting point about ring-fencing. Part of the issue last year—this operated differently in different parts of the country—was an attempt to reduce ring-fencing by saying that the standards funds for certain areas would be removed. The effect of that was very difficult to deal with in some areas. It created some of the problems that we saw. That is partly why, in the announcements to which the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole referred, the Secretary of State reversed the planned cuts to the standards funds for the coming financial year.

In October, the Secretary of State set out our approach. As several colleagues have said, it will provide for a guaranteed minimum increase of 4 per cent. per pupil in every school's budget where pupil numbers stay the same. The guarantee also seeks to take account of unavoidable cost pressures on the budgets of all schools, whatever happens to their rolls. As has been said, those costs are estimated at 3.4 per cent. on average.

The dilemma that we face was well summed up by the hon. Lady, who set out the views of several different authorities. She made the perfectly legitimate point—I think that it was on behalf of Milton Keynes—that in an area in which schools typically have rising rolls, a guarantee that gives a little protection to those with falling rolls might mean that other schools do not get as big an increase as they might have done and that they might, therefore, be under additional pressure. That powerfully illustrates the difficult balance that we must strike, particularly in the general context of falling primary rolls. I shall return in a moment to some of the specific points that the hon. Lady and others made about falling rolls.

The Government have sought to ensure that every local education authority has sufficient resources, headroom and flexibility to deliver the guarantee and to support schools facing individual pressures. As I said, we have reversed the cuts to the standards funds for the coming year and the following year. The standards fund, the school standards grant and Learning and Skills Council funding for school sixth forms will all increase in line with the minimum guarantee, and we were pleased when the School Teachers Review Body agreed to a multi-year award, under which increases in teachers' pay will be in line with inflation from April this year to the end of August 2006. That will give schools and local education authorities some of the predictability that they have been denied in the past.

We expect local education authorities to do all that they can to ensure that funding reaches schools. In a sense, that gives LEAs a more local, flexible role in assessing and supporting every school's needs to ensure that resources additional to the minimum guarantee reach all the schools in their area.

Fears about redundancies are, of course, very real. For those who have lost their jobs—be they teachers, teaching assistants or others working in our schools—there is clearly a human dimension, which several colleagues mentioned. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West referred to The Times Educational Supplement survey of 5 March. The paper concluded:

"ministers have largely succeeded in avoiding a repeat of last year's funding crisis . . . most problems will concern schools affected by demographic changes."

I do not deny that some issues follow on from last year's difficulties, but the bulk of those that we now face relate to falling rolls.

Falling rolls are a serious issue, and need to be dealt with effectively and sensitively. Primary rolls in many parts of the country are likely to fall and, indeed, to do so quite sharply in some cases. It is a challenge to us in central Government and to our colleagues in schools and local government to respond in a way that is appropriate and sensitive to the circumstances.

All hon. Members will broadly agree with the principle that funding should follow pupil numbers and that local education authorities will, therefore, sometimes have to make hard decisions about a school or a local community of schools. We are properly considering the issue. Last year, there were almost 500,000 surplus places in primary schools in England—something like 12 per cent. of the total capacity. On the basis of current forecasts, primary rolls will fall by a further 4 per cent. by 2006–07.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire spoke about the impact on different communities of falling rolls, followed by downsizing or school closures. He was right to emphasise not only the educational dimension but the broader social and economic dimension. In the Government's first term, we introduced a presumption against closure of rural schools in England. That presumption has had quite a dramatic impact and is a positive example of rural-proofing, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. From memory, I think that the average number of closures of rural schools in England has fallen from around 30 a year in the mid-1990s to around four or five a year now.

Lembit Öpik: I am very encouraged by that policy in England. However, I respectfully ask the Minister whether he would be willing to have a conversation with his opposite number in the Welsh Assembly to see whether there would be any benefit in at least considering a presumption against closures in rural Wales as well.

Mr. Twigg: I am happy to undertake to do that. It will be nice to lobby the Welsh Assembly, rather than have it lobbying us. I took the time to check that the presumption in question applies only in England and I understand that it does.

I should like to take up the challenge regarding the social focus of schools, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. It is fair to say that there is a problem in rural areas, but the social focus of schools is important in some of the most disadvantaged urban areas as well. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole rightly challenged us to be creative about the problem. There is an option to avoid school closures, although I do not think that it will always work. She talked about extended schools. When considering surplus places, we can explore the possibility of some of those schools becoming extended schools. Such schools can offer an incredible opportunity to widen the services that are available to children and young people. Of equal importance, such schools can widen the services that are available to the broader local community. All of us who have seen the principle of extended schools in action agree that they can provide a great service on family learning, which involves giving educational opportunities to older members of the family and parents. I should like to take the hon. Lady's challenge forward, because extended schools are a possible solution in some cases. However, I would not want to pretend that they are always the solution. We must consider the problem in the round.

There is another possibility. The hon. Lady referred to the "Every Child Matters" Green Paper and the legislation coming from that. Local education authorities and schools have the potential to consider using spare capacity to develop the children's trust agenda, which aims to deliver integrated education, social and health care services to children and young people.

The hon. Lady also referred to discussions that the Department is conducting with partner organisations to consider some of the options and opportunities with respect to falling rolls. I can confirm we have established a group that brings together some of the key players, including the Department for Education and Skills, local education authorities, the head teacher associations, the majority of the teacher unions—the ones that have signed up to the work force reform agreement—the Local Government Association, governors' representatives, the Association of Chief Education Officers and the faith organisations. We have brought together all the key organisations. The first meeting was last Friday. The idea is to develop a toolkit of solutions working, for example, with the Audit Commission to help local education authorities to meet the challenge of falling rolls. I also hope that the group can come up with positive and creative solutions, very much as the hon. Lady set out. I shall be happy to keep her informed of the group's developing work, because it will be critical to getting things right.

In response to some of the other points that have been raised, we have set out a minimum guarantee, which recognises that schools with falling rolls will have fixed costs for cleaning, repairs and heating, which obviously do not decline when pupil numbers decline. That is why we guaranteed such schools a per pupil funding increase in 2004–05 of more than 4 per cent. In response to the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban), I can confirm that what the Chancellor set out in his speech last week was what an average primary school could expect to receive in the coming year. The Chancellor did not make a new announcement of an additional £55,000; rather, he set out the combined payment in respect of the school standards grant—the money that we introduced to go directly to schools—and the devolved formula capital, which we had announced previously.

Mr. Brady: The picture seems to be worse than I feared. The Minister is telling schools across the country that they are not only faced with the hangover from last year's funding crisis—some schools have deficit budgets, some have spent their reserves—and the possibility of redundancies in September, but that the £55,000 referred to by the Chancellor will not bail out their next year's budget because it is a restatement of money that we already knew existed.

Mr. Twigg: That is not fair because we cannot compare where we were this time last year with where we are now. Other announcements have been made in the interim and schools and local education authorities across the country are working though the implications of those announcements in their budgets. The hon. Gentleman and his colleague set out examples of how that is being discussed. For example, it is fair to say that transitional grant money provides support to some schools that had particular difficulties in the financial year that is about to finish. That money is available for the coming year and, as the hon. Gentleman reminded us, will also be available for the following year.

Mrs. Brooke: I wonder whether the Minister will guarantee that clear information will be provided for all local education authorities and schools about cash grants to schools. If schools have read the Secretary of State's statement, as most people did, their planning will be considerably upset.

Mr. Twigg: That should not be the case because every school has received notification of their allocations for the coming year; no school should be in any doubt about the implications for the coming year. I visited schools in my constituency on Friday and there was a clear understanding that the focus of new announcements in the Budget was on the outcomes for schools of the following spending review. I hope that Opposition Members will join me in welcoming the fact that the announcement for education was made earlier than for other areas, enabling schools and LEAs to plan far further in advance than has previously been the case.

Mr. Hoban: It will be of use to hon. Members if the Minister could provide us with a copy of the letter that schools received about the £55,000 and the equivalent for secondary schools. Some head teachers will look at the budget for 2004–05 and think that they can put off making a difficult decision because they will receive an extra £55,000 in 2005–06.

Mr. Twigg: I am happy to clarify in writing for the hon. Gentleman what has been sent to schools—I will have to check whether it has been sent in the form of a letter or an e-mail.

I shall draw my remarks to a close. A number of hon. Members have referred to the work force reform agreement, which is an important part of the programme of reform in education. The agreement has been reached with all bar one of the trade unions, including the head teacher associations and the representatives of support staff. I welcome the broad support that there is for remodelling. I recognise that there are concerns about ensuring that resources are available. Some areas of work force reform require additional resources, but some will result in savings. In the schools that I visited recently, I noticed that there was a view that less supply cover might be required in schools when the work force reform comes in. Schools could invest the money saved in their own support staff. We are establishing a national remodelling team working closely with local education authorities and other partners to help schools to implement the changes in support of the agreement.

I conclusion, I again congratulate the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West on securing the debate. I absolutely reaffirm our strong commitment to primary education because children must have the best possible preparation, not only for secondary education but for their later lives. I reassure the Chamber that continued investment in primary education, teachers, support staff, buildings and equipment is critical to the future of our education service.

Human Rights (Colombia)

3.30 pm

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): As the chairman of the all-party parliamentary group on Colombia, I am grateful for the opportunity to hold this short debate. It is timely because in the past few days, we have had a visit by Vice-President Santos of Colombia, to whom I am grateful for the helpful and informative briefing that he gave at Chatham house yesterday morning.

I am also grateful to the AB Colombia umbrella group of non-governmental organisations and Amnesty International UK both for the briefings that they have given for today's debate and for their ongoing work in publicising incidents in Colombia and bringing visitors to meet us in Parliament. Peace Brigades International has also been important in exposing us to the work of human rights defenders in Colombia. The Colombian embassy has also supplied information, as has another interesting source—an intern in my office from the United States; although the use of word "intern" may be odd considering Guantanamo bay. Stephanie Adams, whose family are Colombian, has given me a helpful insight into life from the point of view of ordinary Columbian citizens.

Needless to say, 30 minutes is a short time to debate an issue of such importance, but I hope that at least it will allow the Minister to update the House on the Government's position, which is what we want to get on record.

Interest in the House on Colombian issues should be gauged not by attendance in this Chamber, as a hot Budget debate is raging in the main Chamber, but by the fact that 187 Members have so far signed early-day motion 333 on military assistance to Colombia and human rights abuses. That is an extraordinary number, and it is so high because any Member who has been touched by, or had experience of, Colombia takes a serious interest in the country. Many Members have clearly encouraged their colleagues to take an interest, too.

To set the context for the debate, I should like to point to several factors that bring the UK and Colombia together. We have always enjoyed good political and commercial relations. There are active links between chambers of commerce in the two countries, and I am sure that the Minister will testify to the fact that relations are extraordinarily warm, as they are between the UK and many Latin American countries. I found on my visit to Colombia that there is a tremendous, historical warmth between our two countries.

In that context, the UK was the host for the London declaration of July 2003, which established the international framework for Colombia's human rights agenda. Although the declaration brought together several countries, the fact that we were hosting it was not accidental and places us in a position where we have a particular responsibility to ensure that the declaration's aspirations are implemented.

Having visited Colombia with a Member from Northern Ireland some years ago, I believe that the Northern Ireland context is important. There are some similarities in how the Governments are trying to deal with armed paramilitary forces claiming to defend the state, although they are disowned by it, and secessionist groups trying to break away from it. That allows us to understand and empathise with the situation in Columbia, although the death and destruction caused by that conflict is on a greater scale.

It is also important not to take a neo-colonialist approach, which is especially significant in the light of a small dispute between the EU External Affairs Commissioner, Chris Patten, and the Colombian Vice-President. From the Vice-President's perspective, Chris Patten visited the country and tried to tell the Colombians how to run things, and was told off for treating the country like a banana republic. Although it is important to recognise that Ecuador is actually the largest exporter of bananas in Latin America, to treat the Colombians like a banana republic is inappropriate.

I shall couch my contribution in terms of our engagement with a sovereign, democratic country. The Vice-President made the serious point that Colombian democracy is deep rooted and goes back many years, and we need to respect the fact that we are dealing with a fellow sovereign democratic Government. We should not feel that we must instruct them, but rather behave as partners seeking to advise and assist in response to their request for assistance from the international community.

Whatever criticisms of the Colombian Government we may make in our debates, we should recognise that those are on a completely different level from the unreserved condemnation that we apply to acts of illegal violence, whether committed by the guerrilla or paramilitary factions. There is no equivalence in the way in which we treat the sovereign, democratic Colombian Government, and the armed groups who are acting illegally, and whom we condemn unreservedly.

It is also important not to make generalisations from the Colombian situation in relation to some kind of war on terror. The Colombian conflict started decades before any of the current rhetoric and debate on the war on terror—whatever that might mean; the situation in Colombia is unique and to generalise from it is unhelpful. Just as the Northern Ireland situation was unique and required unique British and Irish solutions, so the Colombian situation is unique and requires particular Colombian solutions.

The reaction of political visitors to Colombia is generally one of confusion, because they are confronted with different views of the same events. From a politician's point of view, it is clear that in Colombia there is a fundamental problem of governability, which has existed for many years. There are places where the Government's writ does not run. As a politician who has faith in democratic politics, I believe that the long-term solution must be for the democratic Colombian Government to have control and authority over the entire Colombian territory.

However, there is great concern about the allegations, suggestions and, in many cases, documented evidence of collusion between people who claim to act for the Government and for the Colombian state, and those who carry out the most severe human rights abuses. I have not met anyone who has visited Colombia who would say that the situation was simple—that it was either all the Government's fault or all everyone else's fault. Everyone returns with a confused picture of different views of the same events.

That is not surprising, for two reasons. First, the Colombian Government are trying, like every Government who deal with terrorism, to balance different rights. They are trying to balance the fundamental human right—the right to life, and therefore the right to be protected from acts of terrorism and violence—with other human rights, such as the right to a fair trial and fair treatment by the state.

Those rights can sometimes pull in different directions, and that leads to tension. It leads to something that is part of the normal discourse between all Governments—not just the Colombian Government, but Governments in general— and non-governmental organisations that are interested in human rights and criticise Governments severely when they are seen to have stepped from the path of absolute respect for human rights.

We see that process in the UK with some of the comments that the Home Secretary tends to make, not just about NGOs but about the judiciary and anyone else who dares to question his efforts to deal with terrorism. That is part of the normal political discourse: NGOs and judges criticise the Government, and the Government often respond robustly to that criticism.

However, there is an important difference in Colombia, because denunciation by the Government can lead to illegal actions by paramilitaries. That means death for people who believe that they are acting—and indeed are acting—as defenders of human rights, but who have been singled out as being friends of the terrorists. In the Colombian context, that is a most serious accusation and takes things far beyond the normal political discourse that might be enjoyed in places where such illegal actors are not so prevalent. Again, we can draw a parallel with Northern Ireland, where people were singled out as being friends of illegal actors—guerrilla groups—and were subsequently killed by other illegal groups.

In the Colombian context—again, perhaps, there is a parallel with Northern Ireland—there is particular concern about Church leaders who, in the course of looking after the interests of local people, may seek to negotiate the release of kidnap victims, and therefore may have contact with some of the illegal groups. The fact that they have contact with those illegal groups does not mean that they associate with them or approve of their agenda.

I hope that the Minister will be able to commit himself to speaking up for legitimate non-governmental organisations, Church groups and other similar groups that are trying to work in the Colombian context, and that he will ensure that we always request the Colombian Government to give them protection. The Minister will recognise the reference to a problem last year, when the Colombian President made comments about NGOs, which unfortunately fell on the plate of the then British ambassador in Colombia. The finger was pointed at the NGOs and the British Government were not as helpful as they could be, although the ambassador subsequently made statements to the effect that they would ensure that NGOs had the protection they needed.

I understand the scale of the threat to life in Colombia, which its Government are seeking to tackle. Colombia has a population that is about one third smaller than that in the UK, yet there are between 20,000 and 30,000 murders a year in Colombia, and only 800 a year in this country. I have every sympathy with the Colombian Government in trying to resolve such a serious death rate and I want the UK to continue to support them. In addition to the murders, hundreds of thousands of people are displaced, many are kidnapped and there are terrorist bombings; the situation will be fully resolved only if a settlement can be reached that respects human rights.

I seek the Minister's views on the following human rights issues: first, the question of military justice. The Colombian Government have recently proposed legislation to enable the military to conduct judicial processes in areas where the civilian authorities do not have a significant presence. Vice-President Santos was helpful, fair and open in describing the legislation as a limited set of powers, saying that there would be no sense of military impunity; if military officers abused the powers action would be taken against them—they would have no immunity in that respect. The powers would not be used where civilian authorities, as the preferable alternative, could be used. I hope the Minister will say that it is on the British Government's agenda to ensure that the powers are used appropriately.

Secondly, the question of impunity is significant and the Northern Ireland example is relevant. Settling a conflict requires exceptional measures, but they must be applied appropriately. People who have been convicted of terrorist murders are free again on the streets of Northern Ireland; exceptional measures were required to settle the conflict and it is helpful to see the situation in that context. However, in Northern Ireland, people were released on licence; they were not pardoned, and the terms on which they were released were important—the terms had to be acceptable. Convicted terrorists have no legitimate guise; they have gained no military authority. In the Colombian context, the concern is that paramilitaries who are demobilised could appear in a legitimate guise. Freedom from sanction is one thing, but being able to reappear in a position of power, having committed human rights abuses, is quite another.

We are interested in the resolutions proposed by the United Nations human rights commission. We hope that they will be given teeth with an action plan, but that has still not been proposed, even though the UN has made recommendations and continues to write regular reports. The end goal is to create a space in which people can act safely in a political context. Again, Vice-President Santos was helpful in pointing out that in the political context in Colombia, some left-wing politicians and trade unionists are able to succeed. I do not say that because I support left-wing politicians but because it is a sign of political health. Vice-President Santos cited the example of the mayor of Bogota, which is appropriate, because if people can engage in the normal political process they have moved on from engaging in the illegal, paramilitary process.

In 2003, 68 trade unionists were killed, and many members of the opposition who oppose the political status quo in Colombia still cannot operate in the usual political sphere because they fear death and do not feel sufficiently protected by the state. I would be grateful for any reassurance that the Minister can provide.

Finally, military assistance between the two countries remains a concern. I know that other Members have asked questions about that and that it is limited to technical assistance. However, it is always helpful when talking about assistance between our two countries to reiterate the United Kingdom's clear and strong human rights agenda. After all, the Government introduced the Human Rights Act 1998 and, as I regularly restate, they require the recipients of their aid and assistance to respect human rights as we do. The Government must assure us that that assistance is monitored effectively, and that they are confident that it is not being abused. That was the subject of the early-day motion that attracted so much attention.

I am grateful for the opportunity to debate this important subject. I hope that the Minister will assure us that human rights in Colombia remain high on the Government's agenda, and that the UK can offer genuine assistance and friendship to the Colombian Government and to all the other agencies that work in Colombia. I hope that they can reach a peace settlement, not exactly like the Northern Ireland peace settlement, because we are not quite there yet, but one that at least mirrors its demilitarisation. That was a significant step forward, and to reach even that stage would be a tremendous achievement for the Colombian people.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): I am exceedingly grateful that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) has secured the debate and enabled us to discuss these issues openly. It is not parliamentary flannel to say that I warmly welcome the measured tone and balance of his contribution. One of the frustrations of dealing with the situation in Colombia is that people with the best motives sometimes lack that balance, and that does not help any of us to make progress. I immediately confirm that we share the hon. Gentleman's view that the human rights situation in Colombia merits great attention. Human rights lie at the heart of the Government's agenda and policy on Colombia.

Colombia's problems are immense and extraordinarily long-standing. They stem from a potent mix of drug trafficking and the wealth that that brings to those involved, a continuing 40-year armed conflict that followed decades of violence, and an historical lack of state control over huge swathes of the country, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. The activities of three large illegal armed groups and scores of smaller organisations, as well as of criminal gangs, have made Colombia one of the world's most violent countries. Serious human rights abuses, which affect principally the civilian population, are the inevitable consequence of these problems.

In 2002, President Alvaro Uribe was elected with a strong mandate to tackle these problems. His first priority was to re-establish state control over the whole of Colombia to provide security for the whole population. From the outset, we made it clear that we support his efforts to deal with the dual and linked problems of armed conflict and the trade in drugs. It is critical, however, that those efforts are grounded in a complete and unconditional respect for human rights and international humanitarian law. Indeed, I made that clear to President Uribe when I met him in Bogota last May and in all my subsequent discussions with his colleagues. The London declaration of July 2003, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, was adopted following a meeting of 24 Governments and international organisations. The blunt message that security was necessary, but not at the expense of human rights, was repeated loud and clear in the presence of senior members of the Colombian Government, including Vice-President Santos. We have continued that dialogue since then.

The hon. Gentleman was absolutely right to say that the situation in Colombia is unique and requires unique solutions; there are no off-the-shelf solutions from elsewhere in the world. He also rightly underlined the significant problem in Colombia with respect to the fact that the writ of the Government and state authority does not spread far enough in the country, so that people are beholden to terrorist groups and paramilitaries in a way that is not in their interests. I also agree that there are no simple, easy-to-deliver solutions and that the situation in Colombia is an acute form of the dilemma that faces all of us—balancing people's security against upholding and respecting their civil liberties and human rights. That is an aspect of the current difficulty in Colombia.

The hon. Gentleman referred to non-governmental organisations, which have a critical role to play in any civilised and developing society. That is particularly true in Colombia, where fundamental liberties are under threat from illegal armed groups. Non-governmental organisations have a very important role to play in bringing problems to the attention of local authorities, the Government and the international community. We work with those organisations, and I pay tribute to the work that many of their staff undertake in difficult circumstances. I also believe that civil society more generally must be part of the solution for Colombia, rather than part of the problem, as it has sometimes been portrayed.

We put our money where our mouth is, and give financial and political support to the work of NGOs such as the Peace Brigades International, Oxfam, Christian Aid, Plan, and Save the Children. That is an important priority for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. We have continued to make our view clear to the Colombian Government: respect for NGOs and their work must be a priority. We need to continue to make that point.

Although senior Colombian figures have made some unfortunate statements about NGOs—I think that the hon. Gentleman referred to those—I do not believe that the President is deliberately trying to target civil society. I am, however, aware of the danger, in the Colombian context, that certain statements may be taken by illegal armed groups as a green light to attack NGOs and their staff. That is a real concern and it is unacceptable.

I know the speech that the hon. Gentleman was referring to. I have always said to the President and other Ministers in Colombia that if there are specific concerns about alleged links between certain non-governmental human rights organisations and terrorist groups, they should be tackled through due legal process. A blanket condemnation putting all NGOs and human rights organisations in the same basket should not be made. I have made that point and so have other Ministers. The Colombian Government have listened and responded, and we shall continue to put those views.

The President's policies are aimed at cracking down on the illegal armed groups that are responsible for the vast majority of human rights abuses in Colombia. That approach has yielded some impressive results in some areas of fundamental rights. Clearly, much more remains to be done, but we see those improvements as the start of a long and complex process in which we want to be involved—helping the Government to extend those successes.

We are acutely aware of the plight of Colombian trade unionists and other vulnerable groups, particularly with respect to human rights, and have made it plain to the Government that they must provide adequate protection from threats and attacks for those groups that are at risk. Our assessment is that although the situation is still critical, it has improved in the past 12 months. Fewer trade unionists have been murdered and the perpetrators of several murders have been brought to justice. The hon. Gentleman alluded to that.

Our contacts with the Colombian authorities, and, indeed, UK trade unionists, on trade union issues, are complemented by regular discussions with NGOs and trade unions themselves. We have raised individual cases of concern with the authorities and have facilitated visits to the UK by Colombian trade union leaders to allow them to tell their stories first hand to wider audiences. I have met many of those trade unionists.

As the hon. Gentleman said, NGOs are concerned about the effect of the intensification of the armed conflict, and of the President's policies, on the civilian population. The humanitarian crisis is severe, with between 2 million and 3 million Colombians driven from their homes by the conflict. We are also concerned about the illegal armed groups' adoption of new tactics, such as encircling villages to prevent the population from fleeing, thus forcing them to co-operate. That must stop.

We also share the concerns of civil society and our partners in the international community and the UN system about the interlinked problems of impunity and collusion between some members of the armed forces and police, and paramilitary groups. We have expressed publicly our conviction that the Colombian Government need to take early and effective action to stop collusion and to bring quickly to justice anyone accused of human rights abuses. Again, I think that it has to be acknowledged that there has been some progress in that area. About 15 military figures and 20 policemen were recently arrested for collusion with the paramilitaries, and I very much welcome that action.

We shall certainly continue to exert pressure on the Colombian Government to deal effectively with the problems and to meet their obligations under international law. We also believe that it is important for the Government to take rapid and effective measures to implement the 27 recommendations of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights. Progress so far has been slow and we need to look at ways to improve that situation along with our partners.

We have also made it plain to the Colombian Government that we are concerned about the granting of judicial powers to the armed forces and about the future of the paramilitary peace process.

I know that the issue of UK assistance to Colombia provokes as much comment and controversy within this debate as any other issue. Principally, our assistance focuses on two areas: first, on human rights and social development, and secondly, on the fight against the trade in illegal drugs. Recent projects have dealt with creating a culture of non-violence in urban centres and helped poor agricultural producers to market their produce more effectively. Our embassy is crucially involved in those processes. When I was in Bogota in May, I was able to announce the funding for four community human rights ombudsmen in key conflict zones to provide an independent source of advice and assistance to Colombian citizens.

On the anti-narcotics front, we are actively assisting the Colombian Government in the war against drugs, as drugs are an integral part of the problem faced by Colombia. They are also our problem—80 per cent. of the cocaine that arrives in this country derives from Colombia.

The key issue of concern, to which the hon. Gentleman referred in respect of early-day motion 333, is the issue of UK military assistance. Compared to help in the anti-narcotics field, UK military assistance is small scale. It is centred on areas of direct benefit to the Colombian civilian population. We therefore fundamentally believe that it would be counter-productive to suspend it, since that would affect negatively the very civilian population whom we wish to help.

Recent assistance has been in anti-explosives training for police and military officers tasked with defusing bombs, which are often directed at civilian targets. We have also brought Colombian military officers to the UK to participate in senior staff training courses. An important element of all such courses is the role of the military in a democratic society and the need for an understanding of human rights concerns. In the same way we have also provided, along with the UN, training in human rights issues for the Colombian armed forces.

I can give a categorical assurance that no UK military assistance has been given to individuals or units known, or suspected to have been, implicated in human rights abuses or in collusion with paramilitary forces. I fundamentally believe that to be the case, and some of the things that are printed and written about the subject with no basis in fact do not help anyone in Colombia in addressing the issues and in taking the situation forward.

I will now deal with the UN recommendations and the London declaration. We have made it clear that we firmly believe that the Colombian Government must live up to the commitments made in the London declaration last year. I was pleased that President Uribe stressed the importance of that in his recent speech to the European Parliament. Our ambassador in Bogota is taking part in the follow-up process to the London meeting by participating in the working group set up to monitor progress on the commitments. The regular dialogue between Government and civil society representatives facilitated by the group is a vital and integral part of the process. Put bluntly, I strongly believe that Colombia has a moral obligation to carry out its task in respect of those commitments. I will be visiting Colombia soon and will raise the issues again.

There are many threats to the enjoyment of full human rights by the Colombian population. The illegal armed groups have not taken any notice of the recommendations of the United Nations Commissioner on Human Rights, which were addressed to them. They continue to torture, murder, kidnap and engage in drug trafficking and to commit the vast majority of human right abuses.

Although we recognise the progress made in some areas and applaud the Colombian Government for what they have achieved in the relatively short time that they have been in power, we will continue to urge them to take urgent and effective action to address the many remaining issues of concern, especially those of impunity and collusion between state forces and the paramilitaries. We will balance regular contact with the Colombian authorities at the highest levels, to keep up pressure on the issues, with close contacts with civil society, to ensure that our policies take into account the important issues, concerns and priorities.

BBC Monitoring

4 pm

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh) (Lab): I am grateful to have this opportunity to draw hon. Members' attention to an institution whose work is vital to our country in the light of the threats that we face today. In 1939, as the world stood on the brink of war, the BBC first established a service to monitor foreign broadcasts. A week before the outbreak of the second world war, 50 monitors moved into the Evesham headquarters. By 1942, BBC Monitoring had flourished—for obvious reasons—with 500 employees, and in 1943, the service moved into its present site in Caversham Park in Reading. With the end of the second world war and the lowering of the iron curtain, BBC Monitoring became a vital tool in observing the development and conclusion of the cold war. As I shall discuss later, in recent years, BBC Monitoring has again adapted to meet Britain's needs after the cold war and 11 September.

BBC Monitoring is a division of the BBC, part of the BBC World Service. It is funded separately, receiving about £22 million from its stakeholders and raising about £4 million in other revenue, including commercial income. BBC Monitoring's stakeholders are its four principal customers: the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Ministry of Defence, the Cabinet Office and its agencies and the BBC World Service. They provide funding and influence the priority given to the areas covered. It is worth describing the sheer scale of the operation conducted by BBC Monitoring. Covering about 150 countries and 100 languages, it tracks more than 3,000 sources in the international media. Selecting and translating material, the unit publishes an average of 1,000 reports daily, giving a comprehensive and well-judged portrayal of events worldwide. In addition to around 400 staff at Caversham Park, it has five bureaux abroad: in Baku, the capital of Azerbaijan, in Moscow, Kiev, Nairobi and Tashkent, the capital of Uzbekistan. It does not just translate and relay what has been broadcast, but analyses material to produce a viable picture of events. Reports published by BBC Monitoring cover all areas relevant to those interested in foreign affairs, including politics, security, human rights and organised crime. Clients can choose the type of reports that they wish to receive and how they receive them, including by internet or e-mail.

New sources are always appearing and BBC Monitoring is always looking for them. New technology brings new opportunities. It has introduced digital technology to develop multimedia projects, enabling customers to receive reports combining audio, video and the written word. Customers can also receive a live feed of a television station via the internet.

To provide a truly global service, BBC Monitoring works in partnership with the US Foreign Broadcast Information Service, or FBIS, a partnership that began in 1941. Britain does not have the capability alone to provide a detailed assessment of events in every corner of the earth, but there are many parts where we are exceptionally well placed to do so, often owing to our historic connections to those areas. In those parts of the world, we can provide a package second to none, and BBC Monitoring does the world a service. Working with the FBIS means a partnership with global reach: the two are perfectly complementary. The FBIS provides coverage that is vital to our Government—of the Chinese media, for example—and BBC Monitoring provides information that is vital to the US Government, such as coverage of Afghanistan.

The value of BBC Monitoring's work can be divided into two broad categories. First, it provides hard information about particular events worldwide. It was the partnership between BBC Monitoring and the FBIS that drew attention to the statement by an al-Qaedan group claiming responsibility for this month's atrocity in Madrid. The statement was spotted in a London-based Arabic newspaper. There are occasions when a particular broadcast is itself a significant event. Last year, hon. Members will remember Libya's announcement in December that it had programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction that it was prepared to dismantle. Before the Prime Minister gave his speech welcoming Libya's statement, BBC Monitoring was asked to check that that statement had actually been broadcast as agreed.

BBC Monitoring is also invaluable in providing its customers with information on the political climate in the area in question, including perceptions of Britain and our allies. In recent years, it has included in its work the monitoring of hate speech—broadcasts that incite violence. Countries whose media are being monitored for hate speech include the former Yugoslavia, the Ivory Coast and Israel-Palestine. Colleagues will, I am sure, agree that it is important to have a measure of the political temperature in those areas.

BBC Monitoring staff are not just skilled in languages; they have a broad and deep understanding of the countries in question and are therefore able to provide a good picture of the attitudes prevailing. This is an important point, which may sometimes be lost. In my view, it is not possible to overstate the importance of that expertise. Yes, BBC Monitoring is about sophisticated modern equipment, skilled engineers and expert linguists, but nothing is more important than the ability to put the information received into context, and that knowledge comes from the vast experience that BBC Monitoring staff have of the particular part of the world to which they are assigned.

BBC Monitoring is a tremendous national asset that is very important in today's world. We must nourish it. I know that the Government share that view. Indeed, the Foreign Office Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell), told us last April that BBC Monitoring

"is the main open source provider of information for the Government and the BBC World Service. It provides a valuable service to its stakeholders and to others throughout Government. By tracking world events and reactions to them, including, importantly, perceptions of British foreign policy, it assists the Government in their decision-making processes."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 29 April 2003; Vol. 404, c. 30WH.]

At this point it is probably worth reminding ourselves that BBC Monitoring provides a large amount of the material that makes the BBC World Service the best known and most respected broadcaster in the world.

In a world in which our security is threatened by international terrorism, monitoring has taken on a greater importance, and BBC Monitoring clearly has an important role to play. There has understandably been a considerable focus on secret intelligence over recent months, but people are perhaps less aware that a lot of the information used in counter-terrorism is in the public domain. That information is conveyed to counter-terrorism staff by BBC Monitoring. It is important to realise that among the customers of BBC Monitoring are the Defence Intelligence Staff, the assessments staff, the intelligence agencies and the National Criminal Intelligence Service.

The cold war is miles behind us, and the threat that we face today is totally different. We have some experience, sadly, of terrorism at home, and that has no doubt been useful, but the threat facing Britain today—international terrorism—is far more dispersed than any previous threat to our security. BBC Monitoring, with its reach and skills, is of tremendous value to Britain and our allies in the face of that threat.

I should like to say a few words about the importance of global coverage. The global reach of the BBC Monitoring-FBIS partnership is crucial to its customers; there is widespread agreement among those working in foreign policy that the partnership's global coverage is critical. During the cold war, to put it bluntly, we knew where our opponent was, but in the current climate we simply do not know where we must look next to meet the challenges of tomorrow. Clearly, then, we should maintain global surveillance.

In addition, international terrorism is one of a number of global themes of which we need an accurate and comprehensive picture. Just as with other global themes, such as organised crime, we need global coverage to get a clear picture of international terrorism. From my remarks, my hon. Friend the Minister will not be surprised that I take the view that it is imperative that BBC Monitoring is adequately funded. Hon. Members may be surprised to learn, however, that BBC Monitoring funding from its stakeholders has actually declined in the past decade.

The worst of the damage was done in 1996, when more than 50 jobs and £1.2 million were axed. Since 1997, stakeholder funding has increased slightly in real terms, most significantly in the financial year 2001–02, but that slight increase has not repaired the gap in funding, and stakeholder funding to BBC Monitoring is 7 per cent. less in real terms today than it was in 1993–94. In parallel with that reduction in funding, BBC Monitoring has increased its work load many times over in terms of both input and output.

The number of broadcast stations and publications that are monitored has grown rapidly. In countries that are crucial to our Government's agenda such as Afghanistan, the media are flourishing, and many new outlets require the attention of BBC Monitoring, whose output has also increased massively. Rather than a single paper product, it now produces thousands of bespoke products, delivered to people in real time and wherever they need it, to our military in Basra or to Foreign office staff in Baghdad, for example. That has meant a huge retraining of staff and restructuring of operations. At the same time, many of the efficiencies currently being encouraged in our Departments have already been carried out by BBC Monitoring.

BBC Monitoring and the FBIS form an excellent partnership in providing global coverage. No one would argue that BBC Monitoring should be funded to the extent that it alone could provide detailed coverage of all the media in every part of the world—that is the strength of the partnership with the FBIS. However, as I said earlier, for various reasons there are parts of the world in which we are exceptionally well placed to do the job. It has been made clear to me that if BBC Monitoring were not there to do the job—if, for example, it was allowed to decline—the FBIS could not simply pick up the pieces and take on the work itself. The importance of BBC Monitoring to Britain in the world today means that it is crucial that the Government stakeholders make available the money that it requires to develop the excellent and important service that it provides. Indeed, I would argue that the case for investing in BBC Monitoring is stronger today than it has ever been.

I welcome the Government's provision of additional resources for our intelligence and security services. However, a lot of the information that the agencies use is open source material from BBC Monitoring. Such open source information provides a context into which secret intelligence data can be placed. The Government will fail to maximise the benefits that they should get from secret intelligence if our main provider of open source information is not adequately resourced. In the current climate, given the growing importance of being informed about what is going on worldwide, we should surely be providing more, not less, support to BBC Monitoring.

BBC Monitoring is a tremendous resource. It has an august past and a vital role in our future security. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take this opportunity to put on record the tremendous service provided by BBC Monitoring and undertake to do what he can to ensure that it receives the resources that it needs to perform its crucial role in the years to come.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): I advise the House that the right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot) has obtained the permission of the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang), the Minister and the Chair to participate briefly.

4.12 pm

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): I obtained permission, but only late in the day, and for that I apologise.

I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) for allowing me to contribute briefly to his debate. I agree with everything that he has said and echo in particular his point about the value that the BBC gains and gives to this country from its partnership with the FBIS in the United States. That value is phenomenal, and we are all in debt to the BBC for the service that it gives partly as a result of that partnership.

Only this morning, I checked the BBC Monitoring service to compare the coverage in Israeli Hebrew newspapers with that in Palestinian newspapers of yesterday's death of Ahmed Yassin. The comparison that I was able to make was unlike anything that I could have found anywhere else, and it was interesting to see that even the Hebrew newspapers made comments such as:

"With his death he has bequeathed to us another death."

It is important to be able to find out that the Hebrew newspapers are saying that. The BBC Monitoring service is extremely valuable to this country, and I hope that the Minister will consider carefully what the right hon. Gentleman said.

4.14 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): My right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh (Dr. Strang) has raised an important issue. He recently visited the BBC Monitoring service at Caversham, as I did last September. In a previous incarnation as a humble sub-editor at the BBC World Service in the 1970s, I made use of its output, so I have been well aware of it for many years.

As my right hon. Friend said, BBC Monitoring supplies news, information and comment from the world's media. It covers a wide range of topics, including politics, elections, international security, terrorism, human rights, technology, the environment and economic affairs. It is the main open source provider of information for Her Majesty's Government and the BBC World Service.

BBC Monitoring was founded in 1939 on the eve of the second world war. By 1942, it had grown from having 50 staff to about 500. In those days, it played a vital role in relaying information from France to UK Government headquarters. After the war, it turned its attention to developments in the iron curtain countries and the unfolding cold war. There is no doubt that the service has played a valuable role in the recent past. Today, as my right hon. Friend mentioned, it operates from bureaux in Moscow, Kiev, Tashkent, Baku and Nairobi, in addition, of course, to Caversham Park, near Reading. In co-operation with its American counterpart, it can provide global coverage of events.

BBC Monitoring has adapted to changing geographical priorities and huge changes in the information environment flowing from recent technological developments. It now has access to video footage and websites and distributes material electronically—facilitating a more rapid response—in greater quantities. Users who fund the service can customise the information that they receive through a password-protected intranet.

BBC Monitoring used to be funded through grant in aid from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, to which the Ministry of Defence contributed 20 per cent. A review of the funding regime was carried out in 1994, with the aim of making it more customer-focused. The review recommended a move from grant in aid to a stakeholder regime to be shared among primary Government users and the BBC World Service. The new regime came into effect in 1997, with costs divided as follows. The FCO paid 40 per cent., as did the MOD. The Cabinet Office got away with 1 per cent. and the BBC World Service paid 19 per cent.

Those shares were adjusted in 2001 better to reflect use of the service and were set at the current levels. The FCO and MOD shares were reduced to 33 per cent.; the Cabinet Office share was increased to 12 per cent.; and the BBC World Service share went up to 22 per cent. Total funding is at about £22 million per annum, with the FCO share amounting to approximately £7 million. There is also limited commercial income from other Government users, foreign Governments, and commercial organisations. Last year, a further independent review was undertaken to explore radical options for funding. It recommended no change in the current funding mechanism, although it suggested that a benchmarking exercise be undertaken to make the costing of products and services more meaningful.

I have described how BBC Monitoring has successfully adapted its activities in the light of changing circumstances during the years since it was founded. It now faces three main challenges: changes in the information environment, changes in strategic and geographical priorities, and the prevailing climate in favour of reduced public spending.

Never before has so much information been available to people at the touch of a button. Staff at the Foreign Office in London can read this morning's American newspapers; the right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot) can read this morning's Arab and Israeli press. Information comes at us from all directions—from television, radio, the print media, the internet, mobile phones and so on. If anything, the problem these days is information overload, not information shortage. That is very different from the dark days of 1939, when we struggled to keep track of what was going on just across the channel.

As we have seen, the geographical focus of our interests has shifted and strategic priorities have changed over time. The campaign against terrorism is now a top priority. BBC Monitoring plays a valuable role in providing information on developments in the middle east and elsewhere. It continues to play a key role in covering closed societies such as North Korea, and can make a particularly useful contribution to our understanding of developments in countries with little freedom of information and tight state control of the media. The question obviously arises: should it focus only on those priority targets, or should it continue to offer global coverage?

The financial climate sets an important backdrop for our thinking. The Chancellor, in his Budget speech, warned that the next public expenditure round would be tough for most Departments, and that certainly includes the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. That comes at a time when we are facing a number of pressures. For example, the campaign against terrorism has led to increased spending on the security of our overseas staff. We also have to find substantial additional resources—both human and financial—to enable us to establish a meaningful presence in Iraq.

My right hon. Friend called for additional funding to be made available to BBC Monitoring. I cannot speak for the other users of the service, but I know that it faces the same pressures on resources as the FCO, and I find it difficult to envisage any increase in funding for it. Frankly, we will have to think hard about whether we are able to maintain existing levels of spending. The pressure on public spending will force us to make hard choices. We will have to look rigorously at our spending programmes and what they contribute to the achievement of our objectives. The annual £7 million grant to BBC Monitoring is substantial in FCO terms, which we must take into account as we weigh up the options.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for the points that he has made today and I assure him that they will be borne in mind as we consider the difficult issues in the months ahead. He will appreciate that no decisions have been taken about the future of BBC Monitoring. The issue is under consideration, but I hope that he will understand that I am unable to go into further detail today since no decisions have been made.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-two minutes past Four o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 24 March 2004

[MR. JOHN MCWILLIAM in the Chair]

Reserve Forces

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

9.30 am

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): May I begin by congratulating the Minister on his announcement earlier this year of the appointment of the Duke of Westminster as assistant chief of the general staff with responsibility for reserves? We welcome that appointment unreservedly; indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) has long argued for such an appointment. It will have a great beneficial effect on the reserves, and we thank the Minister for the action that he has taken.

When I was mobilised last June, there was a spate of articles in some of the quality broadsheets that seemed to imply that the mobilisation of so many reservists for Operation Telic had been little short of a disaster—no kit, no pay and the regulars pushed off early leaving the Territorial Army with disproportionately longer tours in the theatre of operations. Nothing is quite as it appears in the newspapers. My experience at the reserve training and mobilisation centre at Chilwell was that it was a slick process. I would be pushed to think of any improvements that could have been made to the organisation, and I said so when I wrote to the Secretary of State at the time.

That is not to say that there were not significant teething problems with what I presume was the first large-scale mobilisation of reservists since Suez or the Korean war. Undoubtedly, there were several problems, and we should have sympathy for those who were at the rough end of them. A great deal has been said about kit, for example. The issue for us in the reserves was whether we were disproportionately affected by problems that arose with the kit. I do not believe that we were, or that there was any question of discrimination. By the time that I arrived in Iraq in early July, there were no shortages of kit.

On the question of pay, those people who found that they were not being paid properly must have felt enormous anxiety, which we should not underestimate. We should ask whether the overwhelming of the system could have been predicted. That problem was solved virtually overnight by allowing the reserve training and mobilisation centre at Chilwell to create pay accounts, but I would like the Minister to address the outstanding issue of the reserve standard allowance. My understanding in the Army was that a decision had been taken to remove the rank-imposed ceilings on the reserve standard allowance. When I questioned Ministers about that, they were rather less than categorical about whether a decision had been taken. What is the current state of play? Such a decision would, at a stroke, remove the most significant grievance that reservists have when they are mobilised and find that the pay that they can secure from the reserve standard allowance is less than their civilian pay because of a rank-imposed constraint that is inappropriate for modern civilian life.

On the question of lengths of tours, I do not think that there was any intended discrimination; there was simply the lack of a policy on how long reservists should serve. Now, there is a UK land-imposed policy. The policy is that a person mobilised as an augmentee will serve six months, and a person who goes out in a unit will serve and come home with that unit. That gives reservists what is so important to them: an indicative end-of-tour date, which is vital for those who have jobs and civilian careers.

There were many teething problems, but the key lesson that we have learned is that the system worked. It delivered the number of reservists required at a time when there were a million people protesting on our streets against the mission, and it did so at an administratively acceptable rate—certainly for the Territorial Army—of 1.5 call-outs for every reservist mobilised. That is significantly different from the rates for the regular Army reserve, which were some eight call-outs for every mobilisation. The Select Committee looked into that issue a couple of years ago, and Ministers need to revisit it. In fact, the system performed better than expected at the strategic defence review; it was able to deliver formed infantry companies, and that was never the expectation.

How did the reserves do? I do not think that they could have done better. They performed magnificently. Although I was based in Nasiriyah, largely with Italian forces, I made a point of visiting as many units as I could every time that I was in Basra. The measure of reservists is that one cannot tell the difference between them and regulars in any unit that one visits. That was my experience, and what I would have expected.

There was clear evidence of creative use by commanders of the skill sets held by reservists; those skill sets were used very effectively, although undoubtedly there were examples when that was not the case. It is alleged that the new FORGE software will give commanders an even better understanding of the skills of the reservists that they will command, so that they can make even better use of them.

I have always been somewhat sceptical about software solutions, and I urge Ministers to consider a rather more important issue: whether reservists should train much more frequently with the regular formations with which they are likely to be mobilised. That would ensure a much better use of reservists when they come to be mobilised.

Undoubtedly, there are jobs that are less desirable in any theatre of military operations. Some people will find themselves on static guard duty or manning permanent vehicle checkpoints. People coming back will have different experiences. They may go into their local pub and tell friends, "Yes, it was great; I really enjoyed my experience", or may complain that they spent six months stagging on and stagging off in a ghastly climate with pretty poor food. However, the difference between those two reactions is often not so much a measure of the jobs that the soldiers were doing as of the men themselves and the units that they were in. It is difficult to change human nature, and people respond to situations differently.

[Mr. Desmond Swayne]

To come back to the coverage afforded by the newspapers, a spate of articles in late August seemed to imply that the large-scale mobilisation of our reservists amounted to conscription on a scale not seen since the Korean war. That is nonsense. I do not believe that, when any reservist is attested, takes the oath and signs up to the commitment, they believe that they are joining the boy scouts or the girl guides. Furthermore, I do not believe that anyone joins either the reserve or the regular forces without some hope of seeing operations at some time during their service.

It is said that there is at least one operational tour to be had from every reservist, and certainly from every member of the Territorial Army, but often the limitations of our careers and family circumstances prevent us from volunteering for a tour of full-time reserve service, for example. Therefore, compulsory mobilisation can be something of a liberation. A couple of years ago, about this time of year, I had been serving for three years as an assessor at the Territorial Army Commissioning Board in Westbury, watching candidates come through who wanted to secure a Territorial Army commission. I received a rather snooty letter from records in Glasgow, pointing out that I was coming to the end of my appointment at the Territorial Commissioning Board and that, as I was above the normal retirement age for my rank, I would be unlikely to secure another appointment in the Territorial Army.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Shame.

Mr. Swayne: I thank my hon. Friend. The letter was saying, "Thank you very much, but push off." I was prepared to accept that, but a number of colleagues insisted that I should struggle to stay in, so I wrote to the Duke of Westminster. He wrote back and explained that there was a pool of watch keepers and liaison officers at Woolwich. He suggested that I applied there. I did, I was interviewed and I secured a place there. I understand that I can remain there until I am 55.

After one training weekend, a brown envelope arrived on my breakfast table containing a compulsory call-out notice. That is what my wife thinks and, more important, that is what the Opposition Chief Whip thinks. The reality is that we have a system of intelligent mobilisation, and about four weeks before I had received a yellow piece of paper in a brown envelope headed, "This is not a compulsory call-out notice". However, it asked me whether my employer would be likely to appeal if I received one. I eagerly ticked both boxes in the "no" column and awaited my call-out notice expectantly. I was delighted to receive it. A compulsory call-out notice for a reservist who is eager to serve can be a liberating experience. Of course, I had to feign complete surprise and horror when the real thing arrived on the breakfast table and my wife saw it for the first time: "Gosh! What will we do?"

I said that the system worked. It delivered the number of reservists that were required at the time required. Employers have been very understanding, and I know that Ministers have been aware of that. The Ministry of Defence, in conducting employer appeals, has been very understanding, allowing the greater proportion of them. The system worked, but I urge Ministers to be cautious. I would like to quote from the essays that supported the recent White Paper. Paragraph 3.3 of essay No. 3 on developing reserves states:

> "This policy sees the Reserves providing an integrated, ready and capable component of Defence, capable of being mobilised for any type and scale of operation."

I am nervous about that. I make no bones about it; I was in favour of compulsory mobilisation for Afghanistan and the campaign in Iraq. One ought not to be in the Territorial Army if one does not accept or even welcome the chance of being called up. Conversely, I do not think that the reserves should be called up on a regular basis for continuing low-intensity operations. To do so runs the risk of destroying the reserves, not least by giving employers the impression that they are being taken for a ride and that it is defence on the cheap.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I apologise to my hon. Friend that I cannot stay for the whole of the debate. Does he agree, despite his earlier remarks, that a large number of reservists join the Territorials, the Royal Naval Reserve or the Air Force Reserve to defend the homeland? That is implicit in the term "territorial". A small but significant number of them have some difficulty in being just an arm of the Government's foreign policy.

Mr. Swayne: That is right, and there is room for both. The Government have formed civil contingency reaction forces, which would specifically accommodate those who wish to serve in the way that my hon. Friend describes. A significant number of the troops allocated to those reaction forces have actually been mobilised for service in Afghanistan and elsewhere overseas. That raises the question of what would have happened if such an emergency had occurred here during the height of the mobilisation that took place for Operation Telic.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): I certainly agree with the hon. Gentleman. Is he suggesting—I would not be critical if he were—that there should be two kinds of reservist? Some should be dedicated and trained specifically for home defence—dealing with the aftermath of a terrorist attack, for example—and some should have a role in the overseas theatre. Does he agree that, if that were the case, it would not only deal with the problem raised by the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) but would give more intense training in either type of operation so that those used on the home front were a more deployable force?

Mr. Swayne: I do not want to be tempted into making a policy statement from the Back Benches, but I think that there is sense in what the hon. Gentleman said. That was how matters were configured when I joined the Territorial Army. There were units with roles in the British Army of the Rhine and there were units with home defence roles. There was no distinction in terms of the quality of training and readiness required, but they had distinct and clear roles. It was possible to move between the two; nevertheless there were different roles.

Dr. Murrison: My hon. Friend is very generous. Does he recall the Royal Observer Corps, which was, in many ways, similar to the civil contingency reaction forces that Ministers are considering? Their role was purely in the homeland and they were not part of the Territorial Army or other reserve forces.

Mr. Swayne: I am sure that there is a role for such a model. Indeed my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) made proposals about the use of volunteer reserves.

Brigadier Richard Holmes once said that the Territorial Army should be kept safe for married men with jobs. Those are the folk who will happily go to Iraq and Afghanistan, putting their civilian identities on the backburner because their country needs them. If we keep putting the bucket into the same well, the water is likely to become very muddy and we will run the risk of having a reserve composed largely of folk without proper jobs who are happy to go on operations whenever they get the chance. A proportion of those are, of course, necessary and welcome. However, it would be a great shame if membership of the reserves became a badge of unemployment.

I believe that it was folly to cut the Territorial Army in the strategic defence review. A bigger Territorial Army would have provided a deeper mobilisation well. I do not believe that, at their current size, the reserves can sustain recent levels of mobilisation for long. We must beware of the suggestion that peace in Northern Ireland, or the advance of "networked-enabled capability"—which is the buzzword for the introduction of new technology that will do away with attrition warfare and enable us to get by with what the jargon says is "fewer platforms", whatever those platforms may be—allows us to get by with fewer infantry.

If we couple together the continuing reduction in the number of soldiers with the continued high-tempo use of reservists, we have a recipe for disaster. The public simply will not understand how we can afford to have fewer regular soldiers and yet need to call up reservists more regularly. As Brigadier Holmes said to me last November, the reserves are a reserve for use but not for overuse. Things that are overused, such as fast cars and fine shotguns, wear out even if they are made by Mercedes or Purdy.

9.49 am

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): I am delighted to have been called somewhat earlier than anticipated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) mislaid his glasses.

Mr. Keetch: I am grateful for that advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did not think that the hon. Member for Canterbury ever mislaid anything, and I am sure that he will be back to make a contribution.

I congratulate the hon. and gallant Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) on what he said. He is a man of great gallantry and has a remarkable position in the House. He speaks with great passion on many subjects, especially on defence and his deployment to Iraq. Whatever the concerns in all political parties about the Iraq war, there is no doubt that Her Majesty's forces performed incredibly well. The role that the Territorial Army played was significant. I visited Iraq shortly after the conflict. I did not see the hon. Gentleman, but I did see Earl Attlee, who had also been called up and was doing a fantastic job in Basra.

I pay tribute to everyone in both Houses and in the Territorial Army who were called up for the Iraq war and for other operations. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right in saying that when our forces are deployed—in the Balkans, Iraq or wherever—no distinction is made between reservists or regulars. At first sight, it is not possible to tell which they are, and that should be the case.

The reservists in Afghanistan are, perhaps, forgotten. Perhaps the conflict in which they serve is a forgotten war. The hon. Gentleman referred just once to that country. A significant number of forces, including special forces, are still in Afghanistan, as I know from my constituency work. Territorial Army units are also there.

I pay tribute in particular to the members of the Hereford reconnaissance troop of light infantry TA, who were recently deployed to Afghanistan. I met them when they returned and they felt that because of the understandable weight of publicity and the spotlight on Iraq, the valuable work done by regular and reserve forces in Afghanistan was being forgotten. We should record our continued contribution in that campaign, which was broadly supported by all political parties for good reasons.

Those young men brought an issue to my attention that the hon. Gentleman did not raise council tax rebates. What are the Minister's thoughts on that? Members of our reserve forces are deployed for months on end—six months is not unusual. As the hon. Gentleman said, they may well be redeployed relatively quickly after returning. It is extremely unfair of local authorities to continue to charge them a full council tax rate.

I understand that some councils would have a problem with that because of the large number of people deployed, and I am always careful about making any spending commitment. However, relatively few people from Herefordshire were deployed, and my local council could have made an exception, as some other councils do. The Government may want to consider whether a more nationally unified form of support could be given.

The hon. Gentleman made some important points, several of which I want to highlight. The most important was the way in which the formed units worked incredibly well. He rightly said that it was never the idea that TA units should be part of that. They were supposed to support and top up regular units. However, the formed units that have worked, including the reconnaissance troop that I mentioned, have done extremely well.

I entirely agree with what the hon. Gentleman said about members of the reserve forces not wanting to be called up or being reluctant to serve. The suggestion that there was conscription is frankly ridiculous. We know from our armed forces—both the regulars and the reservists—that they all understand that they may be called on to be deployed on active duty. As the hon. Gentleman said, many of them relish that opportunity; it is one reason why they joined the armed forces, either as regulars or reservists.

[Mr. Keetch]

It is a sad but chilling fact that there has been, I think, only one year since the end of the second world war in which a member of our armed forces has not been killed on active duty. It would therefore be disingenuous for any member of the regular or reservist forces to say that they did not want or expect to go to war. I have never heard any of them say that and think that such statements have been put into their mouths by others. However, although our reserve forces are prepared, ready and often eager to be called up, they did not expect to be called up on a regular basis. That was never envisaged. We need to consider that carefully to establish whether the practice is right.

I share some of the hon. Gentleman's concerns about the TA being reduced from around 55,000 to 40,000 at the time of the strategic defence review. Looking back, even the Government would probably accept that that was not wise. We could all say that with hindsight. However, we know that events have moved on significantly from the SDR, which was broadly supported by all parties in the House in 1998. We must look at some of the lessons that have been learned.

Reservists have been under intense pressure as a result of the increased demands of the operations in Iraq. There are serious concerns about the recruitment and retention of some reservists, especially the more specialist reservists, such as medics. Can the Minister confirm the fact reported by the The Daily Telegraph that 27 medics are leaving the Territorial Army following demobilisation? I hope that that is not so because Defence Medical Services relies heavily on reserve forces and is under extreme pressure.

I have tabled a number of questions—most recently on 15 March—on the reasons why people are leaving the Territorial Army and how many are doing so. I was amazed to be told by the Minister in a written answer that > "Reliable inflow and outflow data for the TA are not currently available and for the same reason it is not possible to provide reasons for departure."—[Official Report, 15 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 49W.]

In an environment in which we rely more and more on our reserve forces, surely we all accept that a situation in which we do not know why people leave needs to be improved. We rely on our reserve forces. I would have hoped that we had a much better understanding of who they are, why they leave and how we can stop others leaving. There is a growing trend for people to leave as soon as they have been demobilised, which is why we need the information.

Lessons can be learned from the Iraq operation. For example, the hon. Gentleman referred to the divergent pay rates for TA and regular medics. We need to consider that and be aware that some TA soldiers have returned and lost their jobs. The Ministry of Defence should rightly be concerned about that.

The TA has had an active defence role in many theatres, not just in Iraq. Specialist units have been deployed to theatres in the Balkans and Afghanistan, where other regular Army units have been deployed. For example, TA infantry personnel have played a significant role in the Balkans, for which approximately 4,000 soldiers have been mobilised for duty since 1995. Undoubtedly, since the emergence of the new threat of international terrorism directed at UK territory, it is important to continue to explore and reconsider how the reserve forces might contribute to security at home. As my exchange with the hon. Gentleman demonstrated, we could benefit from some of the reserve forces being dedicated to homeland security and defence—call it what you like, Mr. Deputy Speaker—trained for that, and being aware that that is their role. Of course, they would not be trained any less than those units that might be sent to Afghanistan or Iraq, but they might be trained and equipped differently and be ready for a different role or job.

I think that all hon. Members from all parties support the excellent role that our armed forces have played. It is not for them to decide whether they should be deployed on active service; that is for the Government. However, when they are deployed on active service, they perform with great heroism and bravery and do credit to our country. We should support them. I have often said that the best piece of equipment or kit that the armed forces possess is the men and women who serve in them. That is as true of the reserve forces as it is of the regular forces. I join the hon. Gentleman in supporting that unit.

9.59 am

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I meant no discourtesy to the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) by being absent for most of his speech. I left my glasses on my desk and the blurriness in front of me was not the result of a convivial evening.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), on securing the debate and, more important, on the way in which he has encapsulated the views of many Territorials. He based that especially on his recent six-month deployment to Iraq on Operation Telic. I should like to echo many of the things that he said, but I shall spare hon. Members a repetition of the points that he has already made.

I shall briefly consider three areas: first, the mobilisation process, in which there are some strong positives, but also one or two negatives; secondly, the principles behind the use of reserves; thirdly, I want to spend a large proportion of my time on the present size and peacetime structure of the combat elements of the TA.

On mobilisation, one generalisation says it all, but, like all generalisations, this does not apply to every case. Most of the aspects of mobilisation that had to be handled by the individual reservist when their units, employers and families were involved—and, credit where it is due, when Chilwell was involved—were well handled. Chilwell came through very strongly on that. Most of the things that went wrong were in areas in which the personnel staff in the Ministry of Defence were involved.

The medical screening went well. As the Defence Select Committee observed, the gaps that showed up did so precisely because the medical screening was done well. There were paperwork problems in one or two areas, such as pay, but they were on a much smaller scale than they were, for example, during the first Balkans deployment. Again, that is a good reflection on Chilwell. Above all, the vast majority of recruits felt that the assessment and training at Chilwell were well done and was adequate. The Select Committee made that clear. Therefore, Chilwell has come out very strongly. As my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West said, the reserves came through extremely well and the feedback on them has invariably been good.

I do not want to dwell on the negative details because the system is changing, and rightly so. However, it is clear from some of the remarks in the Select Committee report, from comments made to me by Territorials and from the tetchiness of the some of the exchanges with the personnel staff in the Select Committee hearings—the main one in particular—that all did not go well with the central staff in the Ministry of Defence. The failure to give adequate notice is excusable up to a point when there is a war to fight, but we had a lot of notice on this occasion. The disgraceful mailshotting—like a travel company—of individual mobilisation instructions sent direct from the centre to individuals completely bypassed the TA chain of command in exactly the way that the Defence Select Committee objected to over the Balkans deployments. It is extraordinary that nothing had been learned; it was worse this time than it was the previous time.

All that convinces me that the Government are right to take such responsibilities away from the personnel staff in the MOD—who, I am sure, are hard-working and overstretched—and to give them to a directorate headed by a part-time reservist, himself a civilian, and reporting direct to the vice-chief of defence staff. That is better than using an organisation that is not used to dealing with people such as employers and where the focus of its attentions is bound to be principally the regular forces.

On the issue of the philosophy behind the employment of reserves, my hon. Friend put it so well that I do not want to repeat his points in detail. However, a macro-point and a micro-point must be made. The micro-point applies to each soldier, and the macro-point applies to policy as a whole.

People joined with an understanding of serving in action and a desire to do so. My great regret from the 13 years that I spent in the Territorial Army is that I never did an operational deployment. Some of us were particularly angry in 1982. We were in an airborne unit, which we were continually told was old-fashioned because we kept on parachuting on to Scottish islands. The Falklands war happened, but we were not called up. A willingness to give up one's weekends and evenings to work and train hard during peacetime, and the enthusiasm to get stuck in when there is a war or a national crisis does not equate, as my hon. Friend said, to repeated, compulsory deployments after the immediate crisis is over simply to ease regular overstretch. However, there will always be Territorials and reservists who welcome the opportunity to do that bit extra during peacetime.

At the macro level, the fundamental strategic point is that a reserve, by definition, is not normally used but is available when a crisis strikes. If reserves are used so heavily that units are pillaged of their best people because they are all off on deployment somewhere, there is no reserve for when things really go wrong and there is a major conflict. We are coming dangerously close to that.

That brings me to the peacetime structure and the size of reserves. In our English-speaking counterpart countries that do not have conscription, the general rule is that their reserve land forces are broadly comparable in size to the regular army. In Canada it is about three quarters; in Australia it is a little smaller; in America the two volunteer organisations—the US army reserve and, more importantly, the national guard—are, together, one and one third times the size of its regular army. In Britain, our Territorial Army is only one third the size of the regular Army and that disproportion is a great mistake. The wider community is playing a much smaller role and those in the volunteer reserve are sometimes severely overstretched. Above all, we do not have much to rely on when things go wrong.

Moving from size to structure, it is clear to almost everyone I speak to in combat units in the Territorial Army that the present structure is not working, particularly in the infantry. One of the most often quoted and widely accepted defence assumptions is that units can go from high-intensity warfare training to effective low-intensity deployment, but the reverse is impossible. Units that have been trained only for low-intensity work cannot do high-intensity work. There is a parallel with the reserve forces. Units that have been trained to work well together as units and have understood what it is to be part of a company and a battalion and to operate within an all-arms brigade can provide highly effective individual reinforcement, but people who have done only individual training cannot be deployed effectively in units or sub-units, nor in the long term are they much use as individual replacements, even at a level as lowly as a corporal commanding a section, let alone a platoon or company commander.

It is a fact that training must take place within a unit structure. Our present infantry battalion structure does not offer that and I shall illustrate why with two examples. First, it is simply too small. For a battalion headquarters to function, it must have an intelligence function. Information must come in to enable a battalion commander to make decisions and so on. In the recent add back and get well package, a very small welcome addition was made to infantry battalions and the post of intelligence officer was re-created, but he has been given no staff and the man clearly cannot stay awake 24 hours a day in an operational situation. He cannot work on his own. Infantry battalion headquarters cannot function properly even to provide a proper training aid for company commanders, individuals, sub-units, officers and NCOs, and so on, let alone to command the new rapid reaction force unit that is envisaged in the Government's White Papers.

My other example is the structure within the companies themselves. A proper rifle company should have three rifle platoons in it. Many people argue that it should have four such platoons. Three platoons are needed to have a good exercise. If there are three, and there are some people away training recruits, some people abroad on deployment and so on, two platoons can probably be cobbled together on a weekend exercise. Under the present structure, there are only two platoons in a rifle company. There is usually also a specialist platoon, but it is obviously not part of company rifle infantry training. It has other jobs to do. Another set of problems is raised by the fact that allocations across the infantry battalions are perverse when it comes to training purposes, but I will not go into that now.

On paper, the company commander has two rifle platoons. He has no establishment for training recruits, and no establishment for recruits at all, beyond one NCO. The NCO needs two or three helpers to train recruits. The recruits that he has got are on the books of those two platoons, so they cannot go on a company exercise with the company. Effectively, by the time the recruits, the people training them and anyone who is away on deployment is taken out of the equation, we are left with barely one platoon's worth of people in a company. That is not a meaningful structure in which to provide an interesting exercise. As one commanding officer put it to me the other day, it simply means that he knows that his company commanders, company sergeant majors and even his platoon commanders themselves are not being properly trained. That will show through in a fall in quality in the long run.

Let us consider the issue in its recent historical context. Ministers rightly responded to the desperate concern around the country about the footprint. There was a requirement to keep sub-units—TA locations normally involve sub-units—in as many locations as possible. The result was to achieve a reasonable-sized footprint within a terribly small total TA size. The size of the sub-units was reduced and they are simply no longer big enough to train people properly. That will gradually show through in declining standards, although every commanding officer, company commander and member of the permanent staff is struggling to prevent that.

The Secretary of State made some very positive remarks a few months ago. He said that he regretted the size of the reductions. I was sorry to see that the Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Personnel) appeared directly to contradict those remarks, but that is another story. I strongly agree with my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West that we need larger reserve forces. The crying need that has to be met to make the forces that we have got work is not for extra units but for extra posts within the units and sub-units so that they have a meaningful structure and that real training can be carried out.

I end where I began—by congratulating my hon. Friend. He has brought his valuable experience to the House. I urge the Minister to listen carefully to what he said about the overuse of reserves. The TA, and its counterparts the Royal Naval Reserve, the Royal Marine Reserve and the Royal Auxiliary Air Force, did this country proud in Operation Telic. It is essential that we consider the issues of structure, size and mobilisation arrangements if we are to do them proud and if they are going to be able to do us equally well in the future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson), I want to thank the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) for allowing me to call him early. It helped us out of a hole.

10.14 am

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) on securing a debate that is timely not only in terms of the discussion of the reserve forces, but because of its implications for the defence White Paper, which will be rolled out over the next few months.

As other hon. Members have said, we are conscious of the service of—and sacrifices made by—members of the reserve forces who are currently serving in Iraq, the former Yugoslavia, Afghanistan and other overseas postings. Given the fact that, in my previous existence, I was a military historian, I am conscious of the role of the reserve forces in two world wars, for example. We tend to forget that, in the first world war, more than 50 per cent. of Field Marshall Haig's Army were Territorials. Many of the young pilots in fighter command, bomber command and those in the ground forces who supported them were from the Royal Air Force Volunteer Reserve and hundreds of men and women served in the wavy navy in the second world war on escort duties, and many of them were killed or injured.

There is a long, voluntary tradition in our armed forces. Recent figures speak for themselves. Since NATO operations in the former Yugoslav republic began in December 1995, reserves have consistently provided between 10 per cent. and 14 per cent. of the United Kingdom manpower. Operation Telic involved the largest compulsory call-out of reserve forces since the 1956 Suez crisis. It is safe to say that, had the reserve forces involved in the United Kingdom contribution not been there, our contribution would have been—to say the least—seriously constrained. They were not just an add-on option.

The defence White Paper published in December 2003 emphasised that the Government had planned and structured the United Kingdom armed forces on the basis that any major war-fighting operation would draw on the support of the reserve forces. Furthermore, it says that "the utility of Reserves will be used to evolve further to meet the need for compressed planning and preparation time-scales and more rapid transition to expeditionary war fighting. In future, Reserve forces may be required for a greater number of more frequent, short notice operations".

The issues that have been flagged up must be taken seriously. I hope that the Minister will recognise that the contributions to the debate have been made constructively. There may have been some criticisms, but they are more in terms of lessons learned and what we must do in the future. We must bear in mind what the defence White Paper has argued and, in particular, the speeches that the Prime Minister has rightly made about the threat of international terrorism, the role of our armed forces in proactively attempting to deter terrorists worldwide, the role of the reserve forces and home security.

Since the strategic defence review in 1998, the changing role of the reservists raises several important matters. We know that the number of reservists was over-cut under the SDR to provide funds for the necessary changes in organisation and the equipment of the regulars. Such action was not new. Previous Governments have tended to rob the small amount of money that was allocated to the reservists to provide front-line regulars. It is interesting that those days have gone and, in a strange way, I suspect that the funding and equipment of the reservists will have to be better in the future because they are now so tightly integrated into the regulars. Thank goodness that the days of the old method used by Ministers and senior regular officers, when faced with cutting the TA and reducing its equipment, have gone.

The Secretary of State has acknowledged that the planned cuts of the TA and the SDR were wrong. On 20 February 2002, in an interview in The Daily Telegraph, he said that he was "glad that the TA had not been fully cut from the previous strength of 56,000 to 41,000 set by the defence review . . . if its recommendations had been put into effect, TA numbers would have been so low that reservists would be unable to fulfil the tasks envisaged for them in the defence of the homeland".

I believe that such recognition was good.

The reserve forces are no longer the old-fashioned, second-line Saturday night soldiers—as they were often contemptuously referred to by some regulars and much of the media. They are now an integral part of the modern armed forces, and they are frequently used worldwide. Without the reserve forces, the regular forces would be unable to meet many of the Government's commitments.

Ministers will have to examine carefully the organisation and structure of the reservists, how they are recruited and retained, and whether we will need to dedicate certain reservists just to home defence and others only to operations overseas. I am merely an amateur in this, but my gut reaction is that I would be against that. We must have built-in flexibility. My friends in the military always say to me that soldiers, sailors and airmen have to be trained for full war-fighting capability and for being deployed anywhere.

Servicemen and women who have taken part in operations in Afghanistan or Iraq might subsequently, because of their age for example, serve in a civil contingency unit. They would bring considerable experience to such units, but we can debate that matter later.

Mr. Brazier: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. One way of squaring the circle and meeting some of the points that have been made would be to reintroduce the home service force—a company of older soldiers listed on to each TA unit. That would provide a low-cost supplement for domestic use only.

Mr. Simpson: More details can be fleshed out as the debate continues and as we discuss the defence White Paper and the interesting matter of the allocation of resources.

The hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) made a point that the Minister will not want to address in detail. Our special forces have undertaken important roles in the past as they do at present and, according to the defence White Paper, they will play an increasingly important role in the future. Our regular special forces would be unable to operate on their current scale without the full and active involvement of the TA and reserve element; that is crucial.

The critical mass is in danger of being stretched very thin; I do not expect the Minister to comment on that. We should bear it in mind that our special forces, unlike those of other countries, are not elite units whose members are recruited straight from civilian life. They are drawn across the board from our regular armed forces and there comes a point when, if the size of those regular forces are reduced below a certain critical mass, the quality and quantity of the people who can get into our special forces will be affected.

Mr. Keetch rose—

Mr. Simpson: I think that the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene.

Mr. Keetch: I certainly do. We do not expect the Minister to comment directly on the special forces issues, but there is another key matter, which I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware of. Increasing numbers of private security companies now exist; they are used in places such as Iraq and Afghanistan. There is a huge temptation for former members of the special forces to go and earn considerable sums working for such private companies rather than stay on or move into the Territorial special forces. We must recognise that that is an additional draw on former special forces personnel. That is why the hon. Gentleman's comments about ensuring that the regular Army and the Marines are large enough to bring forward special forces people is doubly important.

Mr. Simpson: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. As the Minister knows, the expansion of the Home Office budget to deal with home security has led to many chief constables trying to recruit experienced men and women from both the regular and reserve forces to fulfil certain roles. That is an issue for the Government as a whole to address.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West and others mentioned that some reserve forces effectively play a dual role. I have mentioned that people have been earmarked to serve in the civil contingency reaction forces but have ended up having to serve in Iraq and Afghanistan. Will the Minister discuss the organisation, training and preparation of the civil contingency reaction forces? Are they in formed units? Have they received adequate training? In the event of a large-scale incident in the United Kingdom, could they act quickly and effectively?

As my hon. Friend said, the increased activity and service of the reserve forces cause real problems for certain reservists and their families as well as for their employers. He graphically described the situation, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison). The MOD says in its report, "Operations in Iraq—Lessons for the Future", that it is addressing the problem. The matter was also taken up in the Defence Committee's report, "Lessons of Iraq". As my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West said, and as my former colleague and old friend Brigadier Richard Holmes intimated, we face the danger of running out of reserves if the Government maintain the tempo of operations, some of which are concurrent. Does the Minister agree with that?

[Mr. Simpson]

Ministers may be confident that such is not the case, but, if operations continue at the present tempo, I fear that some employers may look with reluctance upon people seeking employment with them who have a reserve liability. For example, most businesses in my constituency employ fewer than eight people. A large business that employs 250 or 300 people can take a hit of two or three people serving as reservists. It is different if one or possibly two reservists leave a business that employs only five or six people. However patriotic one is, such a business may decide that that is a liability too far.

Like other hon. Members, I warmly welcome the MOD's strengthening of the higher management of the reservists and the appointment of His Grace the Duke of Westminster, who also works in civil life as the director of reserve forces and cadets. He is to come directly under the vice-chief of the defence staff. That is a powerful initiative for putting the reserve forces at the centre of MOD planning. However, will it result in an allocation of extra resources and reserve forces being strengthened in every possible way?

Will people in the regular armed forces no longer think that serving with the reserve forces is a potential career blockage? It was always the case in the past that someone who was sent to serve as adjutant of a TA unit or to command a TA battalion was considered a member of the second eleven. The current Chief of the General Staff, General Sir Mike Jackson, would say that he is a living example of that not being so, having experience as a young captain as adjutant to a Scottish TA para-battalion, which, unfortunately, ruined his liver—at least, that is what he claims. However, in the past, an association with the reservists was not considered a good career move. I am sure that the Minister will say that that is no longer so, and I would like to think that, with reservists so integrated into the regular forces, appointments to the reserve forces will be considered a very good career move.

The second issue is the impression that reserve forces are given cast-off, virtually obsolete kit and equipment from the regular forces, primarily because of pressures on the defence budget. My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West said that reservists who were integrated into regular units had exactly the same equipment and kit as the regulars. It is more an issue for the formed reserve units that were sent out. There were criticisms that they did not have the best kit and equipment and that there were shortages. Perhaps the Minister would comment on that.

Over the past year many hon. Members on both sides of the House have raised questions about pay, allowances and the pensions of reservists and the security of civilian employment. All were touched on by the Select Committee report, and the MOD is undertaking a review of those matters. The Minister has approached the issue constructively but, as a matter of urgency, I ask him to make a statement in the House about how far the Ministry of Defence has got with addressing the problems.

I was particularly interested to see the MOD announcement on 3 February, about administrative changes to the recruitment and re-engagement procedures for volunteer reserve forces, which touches on an issue that I raised earlier. The Select Committee noted that from 1 April new recruits from the volunteer reserve forces and applicants for re-engagement will be required to agree to their unit contacting their employer about their membership. The MOD says that the changes will "enable employers to be in a better position to plan for the absence of employees who are reservists and also to be better informed about their rights and obligations."

The Select Committee said that it was concerned that those changes seemed to have been announced ahead of the findings of the MOD's own study on employer support, and that there seems to have been no prior consultation with members of the reserves. Will the Minister comment on that?

The debate has been short but, due to the contribution of my colleagues, it has been very constructive. I pay tribute once again to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West and other hon. Members and members of the House staff, who in the past two or three years have served in the reserve forces and been, as they used to say, twice a citizen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the Minister, I shall just reflect on the fact that only last month I paid my last ever mess bill.

10.33 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I will not ask how large the mess bill was, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It was £42.36.

Mr. Caplin: I want to begin on a sombre note by paying tribute to Brigadier Lord Vivian, the Conservative party's defence spokesman in the House of Lords, who passed away on 28 February. He had a distinguished military career before entering the House of Lords in 1991, where, if I may say to Opposition Members, he was among the most active peers in the Conservative party. He wrote me a very nice note on my appointment to this position in June last year, to which I responded. It is also worth saying, in light of today's debate, that Lord Vivian was an honorary colonel to 306 Field Hospital in the Territorial Army. I pay the respects of the whole House to his family at this difficult time.

I also want to pay tribute to the five reservists who have lost their lives in action in the past year. Private Smith of the 52 Lowland Regiment; Corporal Pritchard, 116 Provost company; Fusilier Beeston, also of 52 Lowland Regiment; Sergeant Nightingale of 150 Transport company attached to the 27th Regiment, Royal Logistic Corps; and Private Kitulagoda of the Royal Rifle Volunteers. We are indebted to all of them and their families for the efforts that they made on behalf of the United Kingdom here and abroad.

I congratulate the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) on securing the debate. I was expecting a few more of his hon. Friends to be here and, indeed, some of mine, but that is how it sometimes happens early on a Wednesday morning. I have been reflecting on how constructive the debate has been and contemplating one of my previous roles as Parliamentary Private Secretary to my right hon. Friend the then the Leader of the House—she is now the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs—in the 1997 to 2001 Parliament at which time Westminster Hall debates were created. The view was that we could have consensual constructive debates about the issues of the day, and today has shown the benefit of this debating Chamber even though there has been only a small attendance.

Everyone knows that the hon. Member for New Forest, West is a major in the Territorial Army. During the passage of the Armed Forces (Pensions and Compensation) Bill, he insisted on not being referred to as a galloping major. One Conservative Member tried to refer to him as such, quite unfairly from the Government's point of view. I thoroughly enjoyed reading his story "From Westminster to Iraq" in the in-house magazine for the Ministry of Defence, which was published recently, and about his experiences of being in active service and working as a liaison officer to the Italian joint taskforce in Nasiriyah in Iraq for six months. We are pleased to see him back.

The Government hold the reserve forces in the highest possible esteem, and I fully endorse all the praise and accolades that have been bestowed on them this morning. We agree that the reserves form a key part of the United Kingdom armed forces. The reason for the appointment of the Duke of Westminster to the position of assistant chief of the defence staff, reserves and cadets was to demonstrate publicly that we regard the reserves as an important and integral part of what we do. I was delighted to be at Chilwell last month to announce his appointment. He will report directly to the vice-chief of defence staff, and, as hon. Members know, I take a direct interest in all reserve matters and talk regularly to the vice-chief and others in the organisation.

I am not sure what the Chief Whip will make of today's debate when he reads tomorrow morning about the secrets that the hon. Member for New Forest, West has given away. Mrs. Swayne, too, might have something to say when she sees tomorrow's Hansard.

Mr. Swayne: The Minister will know the truism that any speech made in Parliament is likely to remain a secret.

Mr. Caplin: That is probably true. After making announcements on defence issues, I have asked people, "Did you know that we were going to do this or that?" They say, "No. Where did you announce that?" I say, "Only in the House of Commons."

Until a few years ago, call-out for reservists seemed only a remote possibility. In the past 10 years, there has been a major strategic evolution, and I accept, as the Secretary of State made clear, that that started with the 1998 strategic defence review. We have moved from a large and little-used reserve force to a smaller, more effective one that is constantly in use. That has been a tremendous challenge for our reservists, and the Ministry of Defence has good reason to be grateful for the positive response from both the reservists and their employers. I shall try to deal with all the issues raised this morning, but I am more than happy to take interventions if I do not answer all the questions; we have plenty of time after all.

In line with the tenet of the strategic defence review, the Government plan and structure the armed forces on the basis that any major war-fighting operation would draw on support from the reserve forces. Namely, we have more usable, integrated and relevant reserve forces that support their regular counterparts in operations at home and overseas. That is a prudent approach that allows the maintenance of full-time armed forces in no greater strength than is needed for normal peacetime activity, and that can meet a limited range of contingencies. In addition, the more flexible use of reservists gives the Government the opportunity to harness skills appropriate for operations, which are not needed regularly or frequently in peacetime and therefore not readily found in the regular armed forces. Although we have a lot of time this morning, the defence medical service would probably take up the whole of the rest of my speech, so perhaps hon. Members would like to return to that matter on a separate occasion.

As the hon. Member for New Forest, West told us, and as the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) who was called out shortly afterwards knows, the call-out is the use of a legal power to bring reservists into permanent service—in effect, to mobilise them. It is authorised by the making of an order under the Reserve Forces Act 1996. The call-out order for Operation Telic was made under section 54 of that Act by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 7 January 2003. We renewed that order on 6 January 2004 to enable reservists to continue to support operations in Iraq and also in Afghanistan and the Balkans. As the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) rightly said, more than 10 per cent. of those in the Balkans are reservists.

In broad terms, Operation Telic required about 5,600 reservists—about 3,600 from the Territorial Army, 1,500 from the RAF and 500 from the Royal Navy and Royal Marine reserves. That was the largest call-out of members of the reserve forces since 1956. In determining the number of people who would be sent call-out notices, allowance was made for possible wastage rates resulting from those who would not meet medical or dental standards. Medical failures and applications for exemption or deferment from reservists or their employers were also taken into consideration where possible.

I do not intend to respond directly to the Select Committee report, if for no other reason than that I think it right and proper that the Ministry of Defence should give a proper, considered response to all parts of the report to the House in the usual way.

In the event, more than 8,000 reservists were called out and more than 5,000 taken into service in sufficient time to be deployed and participate in the war-fighting phase of the operation at this time last year. The majority were drawn from the volunteer reserve forces. A smaller number came from the Army and RAF ex-regular reserve forces. Members of the sponsored reserves were also called out. Once war-fighting operations were over, there was—and is—a continuing role for reservists in the reconstruction of Iraq. To date, more than 9,300 reserve forces have supported, or are supporting, operations in Iraq.

At this stage, perhaps I should tell the House about my recent visit to the Gulf and to Basra. Two things were interesting and significant. First, I spent part of an evening with the London TA, which is out there at present. We did a question-and-answer session for the members of the unit. One of the young soldiers asked me whether the members of the TA could be referred to as part-time soldiers. I have heard that phrase a number of times. My response, which I am pretty sure is not only right but important, was that I did not consider him a part-time soldier, particularly when he is on an operation in a dangerous theatre such as Basra in southern Iraq. I said to him, "For all intents and purposes, you are a soldier not a part-time soldier". Over the coming months, it is imperative that we get that message across, and I hope that we will do so.

The hon. Member for New Forest, West referred to intelligent mobilisation, which is the other interesting thing. It is an important way forward for the Territorial Army and reserve forces in the future. When I was in Al Amarah, I came across a unit commander who is a chief inspector of police in the UK. He had been redeployed from his normal TA duties to mentor the new chief of police in that town. That is having a direct impact on an area where we have had problems over the last 12 months. That area is much calmer now and part of the reason for that is the mentoring process that that Iraqi police force is undertaking. That is also an area of policy that we want to consider.

There is a continuing need for us to use reservists and to call them out in Iraq, Afghanistan and other areas. I made the most recent call-out order on 1 March 2004, which will allow the continued support of operations in Sierra Leone and the Congo. I assure hon. Members that the new order was routine, and will allow reservists to be called out should we need them.

Mr. Keetch: Given the Minister's experience with the chief inspector that he met in Iraq, is it not the case—as it has always been—that the skills that members of the reserve forces have in their civilian occupations can often add enormously to the contribution that they give in training and active service? Has some thought been given to identifying particular individuals who may provide huge additional benefits to deployed regular forces in a peace-building situation or reconstruction phase? That might be a constructive way of getting the most out of those who have served in our reserve forces.

Mr. Caplin: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point. Perhaps I can respond to it by quoting Peter Morgan, a business unit leader at GlaxoSmithKline. He said on the SaBRE—Supporting Britain's Reservists and Employers—website in November 2003:

> "After visiting Kabul in July, I now fully understand why the Reserve Forces are such a vital part of the UK's overall Armed Services strategy. I am in complete support of employees who join the Territorial Army. There is no doubt that the TA benefits individuals, particularly when skills learned in the military can be transferred to civilian jobs."

I fully concur with that view and I am grateful for the support of the hon. Gentleman.

It is important to say in response to the points made by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk that we do not, will not and cannot take the support of employers for granted. That would be the wrong thing to do. As hon. Members will know, SaBRE was set up about 18 months ago to bring about greater focus on employer issues and to work with employers during call-outs. SaBRE has been a success. That does not mean that there is nothing more that it can do, or that there is no more work to do, but given the period of time since it was set up and what it had to face during that period, it has been successful.

We are constantly thanking employers. I have been to three regional receptions, and attended one in London at which the Secretary of State and the Chief of the Defence Staff publicly thanked the national employers for their support during the past 12 months. It is also important to recognise that the chain of command has been very supportive in delivering employers' support where necessary. I pay tribute to the National Employer Advisory Board, chaired by the Conservative peer Lord Glenarthur, which plays a crucial role in advising the Ministry of Defence on employer issues.

Perhaps I can talk a little about the announcement that I made to the House on 3 February on employer notification. After our earlier exchange about secrets, I am grateful that so many hon. Members are aware of that notification. It was rather an achievement to be recognised in that way in a Select Committee report. The subject was the topic of much debate both in the Ministry of Defence and with reservists and employers before I arrived at the Ministry in June 2003. Surveys undertaken by the MOD have shown that a large majority of reservists have already told their employers that they are members of the volunteer reserve. In addition, when reservists are mobilised, their employers are automatically informed of their membership of the reserve forces. We do not expect that routine employer notification to have a significant impact on employers' support. I believe that that is an important step forward.

I decided that we should tell the House as soon as we took that decision rather than wait for further periods of consultation because it has been talked about for so long. It is an important step forward for the long-term strategic future of the reserve forces and the employers who support us. I should place on record the Ministry of Defence's thanks to employers from both the public and private sectors for the outstanding support that they have provided to our armed forces in the past 18 months. In the past, it has been suggested that we have had difficulties with employers. That is not my experience from going around the United Kingdom talking to them; by far the majority of reservists' employers have been tremendously supportive. What the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk said is right; operations would not have been as successful as they were if employers had not offered that level of support.

Questions were asked about reinstatement and other issues, and I shall deal with some of them. Under the Reserve Forces (Safeguard of Employment) Act 1985, an employer is required to take back former employees who have completed call-out service. The Act also deals with the terms and conditions of reservists when they are reinstated to civilian employment. If an employer fails to take reservists back into his employment or infringes any of his rights under the 1985 Act, the reservist may apply to a reinstatement committee, which will decide on the matter. That committee has the power to require employment to be made available to the reservist or to order the employer to pay compensation, or both. I mentioned that there were more than 9,000 call-outs. However, since 1 January 2003, we know of only 19 applications to reinstatement committees. That shows that the legislation is working well and the level of support that there is between employers and their reservists.

The MOD does not provide legal advice or representation to reservists seeking reinstatement to their civilian employment under the terms of that Act. However, it provides advice to reservists on their legal right to reclaim their civilian employment and on how to seek reinstatement. Each reservist receives a copy of JSP 532; I am sure that the major—the hon. Member for New Forest, West—is aware of that document which is entitled "Guidance for reservists returning to civilian employment following a period of mobilised service". The campaign team of SaBRE provides a helpline and a website that give additional information and advice. Each of the reserve forces and cadet associations in all of the regions has an employer support executive, which can offer advice and assistance to reservists who are experiencing problems returning to their civilian employment. We are also introducing unit employer support officers who will be able to assist reservists with employer issues. The Secretary of State made it clear that we will look again at those issues during the course of the White Paper debate, which will start on Thursday in the main Chamber.

There has also been discussion about financial assistance for reservists. It is right that I inform the House about that this morning so as to bring hon. Members up to date on this, rather than make yet another statement that no one sees. There has been some criticism of the financial package that is in place for reservists. The current banded rates that we use came into effect in 1997 and, as they currently stand, they do not reflect the increase in civilian earnings since that time. That does not necessarily mean that reservists lose out. They are entitled to make a hardship claim if their standard award does not match their civilian earnings. Nevertheless, we recognise that this situation is not ideal. As we announced in the White Paper, work is in hand to produce new regulations governing the award of both the reservist standard award and the reservist hardship award.

The new regulations will take into account the lessons arising from the mobilisation into Iraq. While that work is being undertaken as a priority, it is not yet possible to state what the finalised proposals will be. However, once we have completed our deliberations, we plan to publish a consultation document to seek the views of interested parties prior to the final regulations.

Mr. Swayne: I am grateful for the Minister's undertaking to consult on that. He will be aware that, in a flexible modern economy such as ours, a scaffolder may earn considerably more than a Member of Parliament. However, when mobilised, the scaffolder may be a corporal, and the Member of Parliament a major, so significant hardship would be imposed on the corporal under existing rank constraints.

Mr. Caplin: I accept the hon. Gentleman's points, and others have made them, too. I shall conclude my update on the issue by telling the Chamber that the aim is to bring the matter before Parliament in the autumn. We will then have an opportunity to debate the subject.

Mr. Brazier: The Minister has given us the welcome prospect of future announcements. Could he come back to issues of unit structure, perhaps in correspondence? Inevitably, the bulk of today's debate has been on the mobilisation process. There is a real worry in the command structure of the Territorial Army that the present unit structures, particularly within combat units, are simply not delivering the training needed to continue the effort needed.

Mr. Caplin: I certainly can come back on that issue. I was going to make a few points about training in the last couple of minutes available, but if that does not satisfy the hon. Gentleman, I will, as always, be more than happy to write to him on the matter.

I want to reflect a little on Chilwell and Grantham, because the hon. Member for New Forest, West mentioned them today and in his letter to the Secretary of State in June. I welcome the support that he and others have given to the people who run Chilwell and Grantham. As hon. Members will know, last month I spent a day with the assistant chief of the defence staff, as he is now known. Chilwell and Grantham show how we have moved forward training for those reservists who go through that process. I certainly had the opportunity to discuss with many of the people being mobilised the training that they were about to undertake. That was very good, and I was pleased to see the progress made there.

I come to the point on council tax, which is a perennial for the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch). He must have a chip that makes him say, "I must mention council tax in every speech, whenever I can get it in." I do not mind him doing that. As he will know, council tax concessions are a matter for local authorities rather than the Ministry of Defence. All regular and reserve service personnel who own or rent private property remain liable to pay council tax while they are absent from that property, as that normally remains their sole or main residence. Members of the armed forces stationed in the United Kingdom or overseas are treated in the same way as any civilian who is required to live and work away from home. That is a consistent approach.

I want to update the House on the civil contingency reaction forces, which I am pleased to say have now achieved full operating capability, in accordance with the timetable set out in the new chapter of the strategic defence review. The House will be aware that they have been designed to enhance our ability to support the civil police and other civil authorities. Some 14 CCRFs will be available for deployment at short notice to support the civil authorities at the scene of an incident—whether it be a terrorist attack, a major accident or a natural disaster—should they request it.

Currently, 852 members of the CCRFs are mobilised overseas or are on active service in the UK, but that does not affect the operational capability of those forces.

[Mr. Caplin]

Steps have been taken, where necessary, to fill those temporary vacancies. I know that training is ongoing because I discussed the training programme with one of the commanding officers when I was in Cardiff recently.

I conclude by welcoming today's debate, and joining all Members of the Chamber in paying the right and fulsome tribute to the work of all our reserve forces, wherever they are deployed. They have done, and will continue to do, a first-class job as part of the United Kingdom armed forces.

Disabled People (Assistance Dogs)

11 am

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): May I thank Mr. Speaker, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving us the chance to hold this debate? I hope that the Minister is pleased at the prospect of this debate, because I am giving her the chance to make herself even more popular with both disabled people and the Chancellor. I believe that I have a win-win-win set of proposals: winning for the taxpayer, because savings can be made, winning for animal lovers and for the dogs involved, and, most important of all, winning for people with disabilities who can, through the use of an assistance dog in the circumstances that I shall describe, regain their independence and—in some circumstances—even return to work. Put simply, we can, through the sorts of actions in my proposal, make more assistance dogs available for more people.

We are all used to seeing guide dogs helping people who are blind or have severe visual impairments. Guide Dogs for the Blind has done tremendous work over the years. It has received support from previous Governments, from this Government and from Members from all parties in the House. It does a tremendous job and is popular with the public and the people whom they help. Canine partners—dogs—help many more people than just those with severe visual impairments and blind people. They can be used to help people with hearing difficulties and people with epilepsy—they can detect an oncoming fit, sometimes half an hour before it happens. The focus today is on assistance dogs that can help people with physical disabilities and often people in wheelchairs.

The charitable sector has developed these services and trained many dogs over the years. In this area, as in many others, the charitable sector is becoming much more organised than it has been in the past. There is now an umbrella organisation called Assistance Dogs (UK), which represents the five main constituent charities: Guide Dogs for the Blind, Canine Partners, Hearing Dogs for Deaf People, Dogs for the Disabled and Support Dogs. They are all registered charities and they receive no direct funding from the Government. However, I think that we all agree that they do a fabulous job in developing innovative approaches to canine partnerships. The Minister will have seen and will know about how these dogs can transform people's lives, help them expand their life choices, experience a different quality of life, and very often enable them to take up education and work opportunities. They can make a complete difference.

It is appropriate to mention one real life case. The Wiltshire Gazette & Herald of 24 December 2003 contained an article about a lady who had been suffering from multiple sclerosis and was increasingly dependent on carers. However, with some support from Wiltshire county council with payments for dog food, vet bills, insurance, and so on, she was able to benefit from her black labrador, Naomi, which transformed her life. The sorts of things that Naomi did for her owner included waking her in the morning, bringing her clothes, picking up items that were dropped, opening and closing drawers and doors, taking clothes out of the washing machine and, when they were out and about in the street, pushing the button on pelican crossings. That huge number of tasks brings a smile to everyone's face when they hear about them and makes a difference to the individual concerned.

I hope that the Minister is pleased that I have secured this debate, because I know that she already supports these charities. I have heard from the charities that she has shown a great interest and is keen to help. Both she and her predecessor were helpful in ensuring that the direct payment scheme could be used and that the local care packages could be developed. I should like to say a little bit more about that in a second.

I am sure that the Minister is aware, through her work, that the opportunities provided by canine partners do not just help disabled people; they help their families, too—particularly young and elderly carers—giving them respite and helping them to get on with their lives. This is a compelling case. I could use most of my time describing how wonderful the opportunities are but, rather than doing that, I want to get down to brass tacks. What could the Government do to expand this great sector?

The Government have already been helpful on direct payments. I think that it was the Minister's predecessor who confirmed in writing a year or so ago—perhaps even two—that direct payments could be used for paying food and vet bills. Charities have presented the letter that I received from the then Minister to social service departments to show them that payments could be used for that purpose. The letter was very helpful. I ask the Minister today to reinforce that previous guidance through all the links that she and her officials have with social service departments throughout the country in order to ensure that the concept of allowing direct payments to support assistance dogs is given the full weight of her Department so that more social service departments consider that option. It would also be worth while if assistance dogs were included in the local care packages of people who are not necessarily eligible for direct payments. That would help disabled people, but it would also help their carers and the social service departments to understand the full potential benefits of assistance dogs.

Housing is a difficult issue. People who would like a dog and could benefit from one often find that they live in inappropriate housing. A dog has certain physical needs that tend to require a garden. Many people who are potential beneficiaries do not have a garden and therefore cannot benefit from a dog for obvious reasons. The idea of local authorities being required to have accessible housing registers was debated in respect of disabilities more generally in the Standing Committee on the Housing Bill on 24 February. There was support from both sides. Good practice guidance, which has been published by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and its predecessors, supports the development of registers listing the adaptive homes that are suitable for disabled people and the names of the people who are looking for such properties. The Minister's colleague in the ODPM was very positive in her reply to that Standing Committee debate. She had some concerns that new registers would result in the opposite of what the Government have been doing in respect of choice-based lettings schemes, but I wonder whether such schemes could be adapted to ensure the availability of properties that would be the most appropriate choice for disabled people—in this case, for disabled people who would benefit from the use of a dog.

Current legislation enables dogs that are trained with their human partner to go into most public places, but dogs under training do not have that protection. Someone who is training a dog to be used by someone with a disability is not able to take it into all public premises. I hope that the Minister will undertake to review the legislation and ensure that dogs under training are permitted to enter public places.

I said earlier that there would be huge cost savings for the Government. That is not the rationale for my proposal; instead, it is to give independence back to disabled people. However, because the cost savings would be so significant, it would make sense for the Government to consider more carefully whether this cutting-edge approach would have benefits for councils throughout the country as well as the Exchequer. I suggest that the Government undertake a feasibility study to determine more clearly the relative costs and potential savings.

I understand that the savings could be huge. In effect, a dog would be on duty 24 hours a day, seven days a week. The cost of its food and vet bills would be rather less than the costs of a human carer. An assistance dogs charity prepared a costing for this debate, which I would be happy to give to the Minister. Using extremely modest assumptions, it suggests cost savings of more than £65,000 for the eight-year period of the working life of a dog. If some of those savings were ploughed back into expanding the number of dogs available and improving access to such dogs, particularly for people on low incomes, substantial savings could still be left for social services departments and the Exchequer and the quality of life for many disabled people could be massively improved.

I do not ask the Government to commit huge sums of money, and the Minister is clearly not in a position to do that today. I ask them to give interested parties and me the assurance that they will examine the cost savings potential. That would not require a huge amount of work on the part of her Department or officials, but it might bring home to them the fact that the Government could be far more active in that area.

The Government could help with costs in one initial area. It is in line with many of their policies, particularly the access-to-work programme, and involves defraying the costs of the training courses for the disabled people who are beginning their placement with an assistance dog. Canine Partners, an assistance dog charity that has helped me prepare for the debate, runs its training sessions from a centre in Holton Lee near Poole in Dorset. It rents part of the centre from another charity for eight weeks of the year and, in that period, it provides four two-week training courses with about six candidates on each course. They are very intensive: the human and the dog get to know each other and learn to use the basic 100 commands that each dog is taught, and then the human learns to teach new commands specific to the individual's needs. The course can dramatically change someone's life as the partnership develops.

The cost of the course per partnership is £3,700. That is quite a small price for dramatically changing a life. In many cases, it results in the person being able to access education and work, so it fits in with the Government's thinking on those issues. However, I hope that they will be more generous and not only link the course to access to work but help all disabled people to benefit by subsidising or defraying the cost of the course.

In discussions with the assistance dog charities, I had a slightly more esoteric idea to involve minor offenders in open and other prisons with the training of the dogs. There is a lot of evidence of the therapeutic benefits for offenders of working with animals, and I do not see why one could not have a virtuous circle of benefits for those involved and savings for the taxpayer if there was a way in which a scheme could be piloted at an open prison. The offenders could enjoy the friendship of a dog, learn positive things about a relationship with a dog and learn that, through their actions, they have helped a disabled person. That could reduce the training costs for charities and, if we cut reoffending, the costs to society more widely.

I have outlined a modest package of measures. If the Minister were to take them and run with them, they could make a significant difference to the availability of assistance dogs. I could have taken a different approach and argued that the Government should step in; that charities have shown the way forward and now the Government should run a national scheme and spend millions of pounds setting up their own dog training centres and provide assistance dogs to any disabled person who wanted one. It might be ideal, but it would be unwise to take that sort of service into the public sector. The state can get a bigger bang for its buck by working with and supporting charities and finding ways to develop the work that they are already doing.

There is huge potential. One charity has estimated that there may be as many 850,000 disabled people for whom assistance dogs would be beneficial. We know that there are millions of disabled people, but just under a million could benefit. Not all of them would want to benefit, and perhaps some people would baulk at the idea of 850,000 black or golden labradors going up and down the streets.

I think, however, that we could do an awful lot better than the 6,800 such dogs that are out there in the country at the moment. I am sure that there is massive untapped potential; this is a win-win situation, and the Government should grasp the opportunity with both hands. The Minister has a great record. I hope that she can expand on that and on her growing reputation.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Maria Eagle): First and foremost, I congratulate the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) on securing the debate. One of the benefits of this Chamber is that it gives us the opportunity to raise such issues, which although not always at the top of the political agenda, are none the less very important to many of our constituents. As he thoughtfully set out, it is possible to raise people's awareness of such important issues, and I congratulate him on choosing to do that.

I fully recognise the important role that assistance dogs play in enabling many disabled people, especially those with visual and hearing impairments, and increasingly those with more complex care needs, to lead independent lives. I am pleased to endorse everything that the hon. Gentleman said about the value that those animals and the charities that train them have in improving the lives of disabled people.

It is important that we debate such issues because I do not think that there is a general awareness among the public, who do not deal with such things on a daily basis, about what assistance dogs can do. Many people still think of guide dogs for the blind. They do not realise that dogs can help hearing-impaired people and that others, like Naomi, can assist people who live with MS. A dog can deal well with things that those people may find hard to cope with.

When people read our debate in Hansard, many will be amazed to learn that dogs can already help to pay for shopping at the supermarket. That is one of the innovative new services on which the charity sector and Canine Partners in particular have taken the lead. I am pleased to pay tribute to their work and to say publicly that the dogs' work is valuable.

The hon. Gentleman referred to direct payments. There is no doubt that the advent and increasing use of direct payments has been a big stimulus in assisting disabled people to take full control of their own care needs and how they are provided. Such payments have also stimulated local authority social services departments to think more innovatively about how to fulfil their obligation to provide care services to disabled people in their areas.

I congratulate local authorities such as Wiltshire, which helped with Naomi, and Surrey on realising that the role of dogs can go beyond simply helping those with a visual or hearing impairment. Such authorities appreciate that dogs can provide the care that in the past we thought could only be provided by humans. I congratulate them on their innovative approach.

Direct payments were introduced to give people control over how their care is delivered. Our intention is that they should be flexible and designed around the individual. Disabled people themselves suggested the idea of direct payments, which enable imaginative and novel solutions that are suited to the individual. Such payments mean that practical common sense can triumph over bureaucracy, form filling and processing, and the idea that we must continue to deal with things in the same old way.

The example of assistance dogs shows how innovative direct payments can be. They will not always be appropriate, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged. However, when the council is satisfied that a person's needs can be met by using a direct payment in that way, there is no reason why it should not enable that payment to go ahead. The important consideration is the outcome for the disabled person. It is outcomes rather than processes that local councils should be focusing on, as the best and most innovative of them are.

The Government are committed to the increased use of direct payments for all disabled people, which is why we have changed the law to give councils a duty to make a direct payment to everyone who is eligible and wants one. In the past, there was a permissive power, which was not taken up with as much enthusiasm and speed as we might have hoped. We have now changed the law to impose a duty on local authorities. That means that that approach to direct payments should be discussed at every assessment and review of a disabled person's circumstances. We will also include direct payments in how we assess performance. Hopefully that will get across to local councils—I am sure that it will—the importance with which the Government view the success of direct payments.

The Government have also put money into the support services that we know are essential in helping people to get on to and to stay on direct payments. The direct payments development fund is putting £9 million over three years into voluntary and community sector organisations, which can then work with the councils to promote and increase the take-up of direct payments. There is an opportunity to raise awareness about the potential role of assistance dogs in appropriate cases. For example, the Royal National Institute of the Blind is working in Rotherham to increase the take-up among people who are blind, partially sighted or have low vision by offering a quality of life check. At that point, it can raise awareness about possible solutions.

The provision of assistance dogs is not just confined to the direct payment system. As the hon. Gentleman made clear, some local councils and social services departments are taking an even more enlightened approach to the care packages that they provide and to finance that is outside direct payments. They have recognised the extent to which assistance dogs can be an integral part of care packages for some individuals.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks about my role in the Government, but I have to tell him that my responsibilities in the Department for Work and Pensions do not extend to dealing with social services departments. They are led directly by the Department of Health. That said, we are all believers in joined-up government and my ministerial colleagues in that Department and I look closely at such issues together. There is no reason why I cannot talk to those who have direct responsibility for social services, stress to them the points that have been made and draw his ideas to their attention.

I have, of course, some responses to make to the hon. Gentleman, but he will understand that I also have to approach my colleagues in other Departments. Perhaps I can deal with some of his points in correspondence. He asked me to reinforce the direction that the Government have taken to ensure that full weight is given to the concept of allowing direct payments to support an assistance dog. We have done that. He cited a letter from an ex-Minister at, I think, the Department of Health. There is no doubt that the Department has already issued guidance for councils and that we are committed to making it clear to them that we are looking for a creative and flexible approach to direct payments, built around the individual's needs. It is outcomes for the individual disabled person that are important, not a quota relating to how, and on what, money should be spent.

The hon. Gentleman asked about housing schemes supporting those with assistance dogs. He referred to the essential needs of dogs, such as a private area or a small piece of garden—somewhere where the dog can exercise and have a bit of space. As he said, that falls within the remit of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. He said that there had been some discussions on legislation, led by that Department. He will know that there is no requirement to provide private space, but registered social landlords are encouraged to provide suitable private or common space whenever possible. Under the housing quality indicator system, a registered social landlord receives better recognition for providing a larger open space. So there is encouragement for those who provide housing to think about needs that are not first on the list, including private garden space or communal space, which would be suitable for dog-owners.

I shall pass on the hon. Gentleman's comments on registers of adapted homes, choice-based lettings and the implication of making changes, and I am sure that Ministers will give them due consideration.

The hon. Gentleman suggested looking at legislation to see whether it is possible to enable dogs in training to enter public premises. The policy of the Health and Safety Executive, which is within my Department, is that rather than implementing blanket bans, health and safety controls should be sensibly applied. The goal is not to try to eliminate all risks in public buildings—that would not be sensible—but to have a system under which risk is properly managed. We aim to have inclusive two-way communication with stakeholders, and he is aware of specific problems arising from the attempt to take dogs in training into public places. I would be very happy for the hon. Gentleman to write to me with some examples. I shall ask the Health and Safety Executive about its approach and ask whether something can be done to ensure that current rules are not applied unnecessarily rigorously.

I am sure that what the hon. Gentleman said about cost savings would be of great interest to the local authorities, which often bear the cost. No doubt, they will take notice because, if they have additional resources that are not being spent on the sort of support that someone with an assistance dog might otherwise need, they could not only provide a more efficient local service but have some spare money to do something for someone else in their area. I am sure that when local authorities start to think about the wider benefit of assistance dogs, they will recognise the potential.

On defraying the cost of training courses for disabled people as they learn to work with their assistance dog, the hon. Gentleman will know that the Department for Work and Pensions arranges vocational training—he referred to the access to work scheme, which is a little different—for long-term unemployed adults, many of whom have disabilities and are visually impaired, and for whom suitable vocational training provision is not available. On our courses, we ensure that any specialist support that is necessary for someone to make progress, including that relating to assistance dogs, is met. That does not deal with his concern about the cost of learning to work with the dog. I shall have to return to that, which I undertake to do.

The hon. Gentleman made an interesting suggestion about prisoners. He will be aware that, along with all the other matters for which I am not responsible, I am not responsible for prisoners. However, I shall take his idea to my colleague in the Home Office and return to him with an answer. It is not something on which I want to stick my neck out at the moment.

[Maria Eagle]

The hon. Gentleman had a number of interesting ideas and I am pleased to see his enthusiasm, which I can well understand, having met many of the charities that provide assistance dogs. The great value of his comments, which extends beyond simply the issues raised and his ideas, is the opportunity to raise awareness among us all about the potential of assistance dogs. We need to make it clear to the public that their use goes beyond guide dogs for the blind and that they can provide much help and support for disabled people. It is clear that disabled people value their help widely.

Non-proliferation Treaty Review

2 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): We have no Hansard reporter in the Chamber at present. However, the debate is being transcribed, so the position is not as bad as people might think.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to introduce a debate on the non-proliferation treaty and its five-yearly review next year. The PrepCom will take place in April this year. I wish to declare an interest. I joined the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament at the age of 16 and I have no plans to resign from it. I do not recant anything that I have done within CND and I am a member of its national council. I am proud to be a member. I thank the CND and the House of Commons Library for their help in preparing for the debate.

Last week, my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) initiated an interesting half-hour Adjournment debate on the acceptance or otherwise of nuclear weapons by the British Government. The Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell), replied to the discussions. I shall set the debate in context. We live in an incredibly dangerous world. Since 1945, there has been a huge number of wars. Many people have died as a result of those conflicts, yet we are still arming ourselves with nuclear weapons. While the purpose of the NPT is to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons, we must recognise the heroic efforts of peace campaigners since nuclear weapons were first invented. People have bravely laid down their lives or devoted their whole lives to peace campaigns, such as the Nobel peace prize winner, Joseph Rotblat, who was part of the Manhattan project. There are many others, of course, such as the brave women of Greenham common who did so much to bring home to the world the dangers of the proliferation of nuclear weapons, and a hero, Mordecai Vanunu, who is deserving of the Nobel peace prize and who is shortly to be released from prison. He has spent 14 years in an Israeli prison for having the temerity to tell the world that Israel was illegally developing nuclear weapons.

The case against nuclear weapons is strong. Each year, in Tavistock square in London—as in many other countries throughout the world—we remember Hiroshima day. We commemorate what happened on 6 August 1945 when nuclear weapons were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, as a result of which 60,000 people died immediately. The effects of the cancers at that time are still with us and people are still dying as a result of those explosions. They were no more than fireworks compared with the nuclear weapons that are now available to us. We should reflect for a moment on what has been achieved since 1945 in respect of even more nuclear weapons and greater dangers.

In his speech on 16 March 2004, my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent rightly quoted at column number 293 something that former President Jimmy Carter said about nuclear weapons. I shall repeat the quote because it is very apt. The former President argued:

"In an all-out nuclear war, more destructive power than in all of World War II would be unleashed every second during the long afternoon it would take for all the missiles and bombs to fall.

A World War II every second—more people killed in the first few hours than all the wars of history put together. The survivors, if any, would live in despair amid the poisoned ruins of a civilisation that had committed suicide."

My hon. Friend also quoted former Soviet leader Khrushchev, who expressed similar sentiments when he said that "the survivors would envy the dead."

Before we go into the minutiae of treaty negotiations and the technicalities of the issue, we must reflect on why we are trying to achieve nuclear disarmament and why many people have dedicated their lives to that end. The review conference in 2005 is important. It is the five-yearly review. When the Minister replies to the debate, I hope that he will give us some idea of what the Government's position will be and how he intends to involve Parliament in discussions about that so that MPs can make known their views on the matter.

The NPT review will take place as a result of the treaty that was first signed in 1970. It involved all the signatory states in the definition of what nuclear weapons were and in how they would get rid of them. The five declared nuclear weapon states undertook to get rid of their own nuclear weapons eventually. There was a commitment to total nuclear disarmament. That commitment remains, but it is a long way from being achieved.

I will list the declared nuclear weapon states. The United States developed nuclear weapons during the second world war in response to the true perception that Nazi Germany was also developing them, and it is the only country to explode them in anger. The Soviet Union followed by developing them in the immediate post-war period. Both the superpowers relied heavily in the development of their programmes on the expertise of Nazi weapons experts captured in 1945. Britain and France followed suit, but they developed smaller weapons. Then, dramatically, in 1964 China declared that it had nuclear weapons and exploded one.

The non-declared states that we know hold nuclear weapons are India, Pakistan and Israel. None of them has signed up to the NPT. That they should do so must remain a central demand of everyone involved in the peace movement. Another country that was well known to have nuclear weapons but was not a declared nuclear power was South Africa. Nelson Mandela and the African National Congress have achieved many great things; we should thank them for revealing to the world the existence of South African nuclear weapons when they took power, and for renouncing their use and abolishing them. That allowed Africa to become a nuclear-free continent. We should remember that it is possible unilaterally to declare oneself to be nuclear disarmed and not to suffer immediate invasion from somewhere else.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be useful if today or in the near future the Government were to make clear their intention not to continue with Trident when it reaches the end of its natural life? That would be a huge step forward in ensuring that the treaty becomes workable and effective throughout the world.

Jeremy Corbyn: I agree. I was going to mention Trident later.

The other countries that are believed to have nuclear weapons—or, at least, the capability of developing them—are Iran, Libya and North Korea. However, it is conceivable that most countries that have access to nuclear power could, in the right circumstances, develop nuclear weapons as well, although considerable technological knowledge would be required to achieve that.

We have NPTs and bans on the export of nuclear material and the technology that goes with it, but the limitations of all of that have been exposed by the statements of Abdul Qadeer Khan of Pakistan, who told the world about the large quantities of nuclear material that he had been involved in exporting to North Korea and other countries and the danger that goes with that.

So far, 188 have signed up to the NPT. The latest three to join are Cuba and East Timor. The only three states that remain outside the NPT process are India, Israel and Pakistan. I appeal to the Government to do everything that they can to persuade those countries to sign up to the NPT and to accept that the world must get rid of nuclear weapons altogether. If we are serious about persuading them to nuclear disarm, we should question why we are providing them with such a vast amount of conventional arms, which can be used in a localised war between India and Pakistan, and in the case of Israel can be, and are, used against the Palestinian people in the continued occupation of Palestine. The 2000 review agreed on 13 steps, all of which led towards a nuclear-free world, but the associated comprehensive test ban treaty has been signed by only 180 countries. Twenty-one countries have not signed it. I urge the Government to do everything that they can to persuade those countries to sign the treaty.

We should remember that the atmospheric testing of nuclear weapons that took place routinely during the 1950s and early 1960s caused enormous environmental damage throughout the Pacific and in Australia. People, including British soldiers, are still dying who are nuclear test veterans. That is the reality of nuclear weapons and explosions.

In The Economist in October 2003, Muhammed El Baradei, the UN nuclear weapons expert, wrote an interesting and long article called "Towards a safer world" as head of the UN's investigation team. I shall quote briefly from it. He wrote that "controlling access to nuclear-weapons technology has grown increasingly difficult. The technical barriers to designing weapons and to mastering the processing steps have eroded with time . . . Uranium enrichment is sophisticated and expensive, but it is not proscribed under the NPT. Most designs for civilian nuclear-power reactors require fuel that has been 'low-enriched', and many research reactors operate with 'high-enriched' uranium. It is not uncommon, therefore, for non-nuclear-weapon states with developed nuclear infrastructures to seek enrichment capabilities and to possess sizeable amounts of uranium that could, if desired, be enriched to weapons-grade."

He continued:

"In 1970, it was assumed that relatively few countries knew how to acquire nuclear weapons. Now, with 35 to 40 countries in the know by some estimates, the margin of security under the current non-proliferation regime is becoming too slim for comfort."

He calls for a new approach and gives three proposals. The first is "to limit the processing of weapon-usable material (separated plutonium and high-enriched uranium) in civilian nuclear programmes, as well as the production of new material through reprocessing and enrichment."

[Jeremy Corbyn]

His other two proposals are that

"nuclear-energy systems should be deployed that, by design, avoid the use of materials that may be applied directly to making nuclear weapons" and that

"we should consider multinational approaches to the management and disposal of spent fuel and radioactive waste. More than 50 countries have spent fuel stored in temporary sites, awaiting processing or disposal. Not all countries have the right geology to store waste underground and, for many countries with small nuclear programmes for electricity generation or for research," the cost of facilities is prohibitive. By bringing his considerable expertise to bear on the subject, he has pointed out some of the technical problems and limitations that one hopes that the NPT review conference will address.

The British Government will be participating in the PrepCom in April and May 2004 and in the full review conference next year. There are a number of issues that the British Government must address and I hope that we can discuss them briefly this afternoon. The first issue is that, if we are serious about nuclear disarmament, we must say that we are not prepared to use nuclear weapons. However, the Secretary of State for Defence made a number of statements throughout the run-up to the Iraq war and since—which were repeated by the Minister last week in a debate in the House—that the British Government would not rule out the use of nuclear weapons. I find it inconceivable that this country would ever use nuclear weapons. I want to hear the Minister say that, so that we can declare ourselves serious about disarmament and the non-use of nuclear weapons. I know that a number of facilities have been taken out of use and a number of submarines taken off patrol and that the number of active nuclear warheads is much reduced. Nevertheless, it takes only one warhead to go off to set off a nuclear conflict.

The second issue is the proliferation of nuclear weapons, which I believe is part and parcel of the US proposals for national missile defence, and Britain's signing up to the initial part of the NMD process. If we are to lecture the rest of the world on the need for nuclear disarmament, it ill behoves us to develop national missile defence, given the danger of proliferation.

The third issue is the one raised by my friend, the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas), in his intervention concerning the replacement for Trident, which is becoming more or less obsolete, as did Polaris before that. It would be nice to hear that there are no plans to replace that nuclear facility, and that we are committed to the statement to which we readily signed up in 1970 for the eventual elimination of nuclear weapons.

There is also the question of rigorous inspections in Iran, Korea and Libya. Although such inspections are taking place in Libya and, to some extent, Iran, and although negotiations are going on in Korea, one hopes that the NPT conference will be an opportunity to ensure effective inspections. As I pointed out, we should also continue to put pressure on Israel, India and Pakistan to rid themselves of nuclear weapons.

In 2000, my old friend, the sadly recently deceased Lord Jenkins of Putney, asked in the House of Lords whether the Government were "hoping to make substantial progress towards world nuclear disarmament at the coming United Nations NPT Review Conference in New York"—

that is, PrepCom—

"and how they propose to avoid the procedural discussions which are reported to have nullified the recent Geneva Conference."

That was four years ago. In reply, the Minister said:

"We are looking for the conference to result in a balanced review which takes account of the positive steps which both we and other nuclear weapon states have taken over the past five years and which also sets a realistic agenda for the next five years." —[Official Report, House of Lords, 28 February 2000; Vol. 610, c. 323 and 324.]

Those were nice words well put, but unfortunately the problem remains that that conference, although important in itself, did not achieve the desired breakthrough. One hopes that there will be a breakthrough in the conference this April and May.

I hope that the Minister will answer the points that I—and, no doubt, other hon. Members—will raise this afternoon concerning the existence and use of nuclear weapons and, above all, the possibility of nuclear disarmament that comes from the NPT process. I also hope that he will seriously consult with the many bodies of opinion and expertise in this country, including those in the peace movement and various defence analysts and experts, so that there is popular understanding of what the NPT process is about, and of the possibility of our achieving nuclear disarmament.

The 1970 treaty envisaged that all states would eventually rid themselves completely of all nuclear weapons. In 1998, at the United Nations, the "new agenda" coalition of countries—Brazil, Egypt, Ireland, Mexico, New Zealand, Slovenia, South Africa and Sweden—proposed that we should get rid of all nuclear weapons, and saw that as a way forward. Why did the United Kingdom vote against the resolution put by those very honourable countries, all of which were very clearly saying something about nuclear weapons? Why was the opportunity of the 1998 strategic defence review not used to allow us to go a little bit further than we did in reducing the number of nuclear weapons on patrol? Why did we not use that opportunity to try to bring about the aspirations of the 1970 treaty?

I conclude—so that others may speak—by saying that the world has the ability to destroy itself many times over. Many people are dying because of conventional weapons, and many more would die if nuclear weapons were used. Many countries want to get hold of nuclear weapons because they see that the five permanent members of the Security Council are members of the nuclear club, and are the people with the power, deciding how the world is run. If the example is set by those five powers, who are expanding their nuclear capability through national missile defence, or a regeneration of Trident, or whatever, that does not make the world a safer place; in fact, it makes it infinitely more dangerous. The non-proliferation treaty debate—the conference next year—is an opportunity to step towards peace and use our skill, expertise and wealth for peaceful purposes, rather than for the development of weapons of mass destruction, which we hold in this country.

I have been in the CND all my life, and I am in a party with my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent, who has met many Members who are very committed to nuclear disarmament. This is a live issue in political debate, and I hope that today's debate goes some way towards encouraging further public discussion, with the hope and aspiration that there can be a world completely rid of nuclear weapons and their consequences.

2.19 pm

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): I should like to begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing this important debate on a subject that we do not spend enough time discussing in Parliament. Although he has used the opportunity of the forthcoming review to hang his ideas on, those ideas flow throughout the security of this country and, more important, they underpin our dealings with other countries. We only have to look to our debate in Prime Minister's—or should I say Deputy Prime Minister's—questions on Libya and our relationship with that country to see how important it is to work on disarmament, rather than armament. I fully support and concur with the hon. Gentleman's ideas.

I want to concentrate first on the concept of a strategic deterrent in the form of nuclear weapons, which it seems that we have in this country at the moment, and secondly, on the proliferation security initiative, about which I should like to ask the Minister a few questions.

I begin with the defence White Paper of December 2003, which reiterated that "our minimum nuclear deterrent capability, currently represented by Trident, is likely to remain a necessary element of our security."

People tend to get somewhat disheartened on reading such words, because they are a de facto acceptance of a retention of a permanent policy commitment to nuclear weapons, in defiance of the international commitments and treaty obligations that the hon. Member for Islington, North outlined and which, incidentally, are not mentioned in the defence White Paper. In other words, the White Paper does not set out how the Government are setting about meeting their international treaty obligations to disarm and undergo nuclear disarmament, or how we square our treaty obligations with an ongoing commitment to Trident.

The White Paper also states that the UK faces "no major conventional military" threat. I think that that is still so. The threat that is identified, and which we have seen all too clearly over the past couple of weeks, is that of terrorism and of proliferation in terrorist methods. We must ask ourselves, "What possible use is our nuclear deterrent against that real threat to our daily lives in the United Kingdom, which is not in any way related to the issues of proliferation of nuclear weapons?" I shall deal with the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction in a moment. If we believe that the reliance on nuclear weapons as a strategic deterrent is of no relevance in the war on terror, that prompts the question of why we, as a nation, are holding back from moving forward on nuclear disarmament and particularly, why the defence White Paper says:

"Decisions on whether to replace Trident" or not are not decisions to be made in

"this Parliament but are likely to be required in the next".

I regard that as a clear indication that the Government have in mind a timetable for a replacement for Trident. That is why I was grateful to the hon. Member for Islington, North for allowing my intervention and for his remarks. It is clear from the White Paper that the Government have in mind a replacement for Trident. It would be useful if the Minister were able to say something today about any research that may be going on in nuclear installations in this country regarding such a replacement. That situation also underpins the need for parliamentary debate on such matters, to prevent our being bounced, as we were with the strategic defence initiative, into agreement with other countries about their defence and nuclear-based defence capabilities.

We were initially told that there would be upgrading work at Fylingdales for the strategic defence initiative during this month. It would be useful if the Minister said something today at least to confirm what is happening at Fylingdales at the moment and to give us the current state of play of that initiative.

We need to consider where the Government's policy is on this matter. The hon. Member for Islington, North set out clearly the international obligations and the way that he would wish the Government to address them, but we need to consider what they are actually saying on these matters. I reiterate—it is important to say this on the record—that the Government have not ruled out the use of nuclear weapons. On 20 March 2002 the Secretary of State for Defence told the Defence Select Committee that "in the right conditions"

"would be willing to use our nuclear weapons."

There are no right conditions in which to use nuclear weapons—that is the central question. However, we need to know what those right conditions are. Under what conditions do the Government foresee that it would be permissible or allowable to use nuclear weapons? The White Paper dismisses the idea of a major conventional threat to this country and identifies terrorism as the threat to our daily lives. That prompts the question, what are the Government doing about the issue?

On 2 February 2003, I asked the Prime Minister about the pre-emptive use of nuclear weapons in the context of what was then the forthcoming war on Iraq. Once again, the Prime Minister refused to rule out the pre-emptive use of nuclear weapons and simply said that there was a traditional British doctrine. However, we do not know what that is because we have no explanation of what the right conditions would be for the use of nuclear weapons.

There was another interesting response in a parliamentary answer to the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch). He asked the Defence Secretary about the nuclear weapons programmes and there was the same reply:

"Under the terms of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, the United Kingdom, the United States, France, China and Russia are legally entitled to possess nuclear weapons."—[Official Report, 30 October 2003; Vol. 412, c. 320 W.]

That is not what the treaty says at all; it does not give a legal entitlement to the ongoing possession of nuclear weapons. The purpose of that treaty is to control the proliferation of nuclear weapons and to facilitate their total elimination. It does not give a legal remit to hold on to nuclear weapons at all. Article VI of the treaty states:

"Each of the Parties to the Treaty undertakes to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date"— to a certain extent, the treaty has been successful on that—

"and on a Treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control."

The only conclusion that I can draw from the Minister's reply to the hon. Member for Hereford is that the UK is trying to rewrite ipso facto the nuclear non-proliferation treaty to give the present nuclear weapon states, including the UK, some sort of legal basis on which to own nuclear weapons. I return to what the Secretary of State for Defence told the House of Commons on 5 June 2000. He said that

"the non-proliferation treaty as an agreement is an aspiration; it is not likely to produce results in the short term."—[Official Report, 5 June 2000; Vol. 351, c. 12.]

I would say that the treaty has produced results. Whatever argument one may use about the history of the arms race, the treaty was useful in introducing effective measures to bring about the cessation of the nuclear arms race and can be effective for the future—this is the important thing for the review—for general and complete disarmament and a strict and effective international control. It is very unfortunate that the Secretary of State seems to have dismissed that as an aspiration when that aspiration has, partly at least, come about. The Government have obviously worked along those lines and I would like to see them work much harder to make the non-proliferation treaty work in that regard.

Finally, I should like to note in passing that the department in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office that deals with such matters has changed its name from the non-proliferation unit to the proliferation prevention unit. There is a subtlety of meaning there. "Non-proliferation" tied in the work of that department to the treaty, which was not just about non-proliferation but about nuclear disarmament. "Proliferation prevention" ties the department in much more to the current agenda of the nuclear states and the United States in particular. That agenda is about stopping other countries getting the weapons that we have and about keeping the weapons that we have. That is a very basic, rude and crude way of putting it, I know. However, that is what the United States policy is; I should be delighted if the Minister would put some more flesh on that from the United Kingdom policy point of view.

I want to mention the proliferation security initiative. We have not heard much about that in Parliament, and in general the issue has gone quiet during the past few months. However, hon. Members may remember that it was a United States State Department initiative. As it put it, it was set up "as a response to the growing challenge posed by the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction".

We know that such weapons are proliferating in Pakistan and North Korea. They may not be proliferating in Iraq, of course; that is a different matter. The idea was that there could be an international seizure of the trade in weapons of mass destruction, particularly on the high seas. There were attempts just before the Gulf war to seize a shipment of missiles en route to Yemen from the Republic of North Korea. That turned out to be perfectly legal, in general international terms at least.

I remind the Chamber of what the proliferation security initiative says that it intends to achieve. Its interdiction principles state that it intends "to establish a more coordinated and effective basis through which to impede and stop shipments of WMD, delivery systems, and related materials flowing to and from states and non-state actors of proliferation concern, consistent with national legal authorities and relevant international law and frameworks, including the UN Security Council."

I have some brief questions to put to the Minister and I hope that he can respond to some of them. One question is about the relationship between international law and frameworks and the United Nations Security Council. The US State Department has seized on a 1992 presidential statement of the UN Security Council to give it the authority to exercise the use of force to interdict ships on the high seas and check them. It does that in the name of non-proliferation. However, there are some serious questions as to whether that presidential statement gives it legal authority, and as to whether the international law and frameworks of maritime law, which are pretty well developed, run counter to that.

My second question relates to how any cases of such interdiction would be brought before the UN by the participants in the proliferation security initiative. The UK is a core part of that initiative. We also need to note that that initiative is a coalition of the willing—to use a phrase from another context—rather than an organisation based on an international treaty. We must ask ourselves how "states of concern"—that is the wording of the initiative—will be identified. Does the phrase have a legal definition or, as we have seen in the case of Iraq, does it allow one country to decide that another country is of concern and that action must be taken against it?

What mechanism will be adopted in the case of interdiction? Finally, what is to prevent any nation from adopting the same criteria and boarding any ship that it believes to be of concern, thereby thwarting legitimate trade between nations? Such measures could be used to put pressure on countries that do not fit in with the ideals of the nation concerned. We have only to think about what the US State Department thinks about Cuba, which internationally is a perfectly legal and recognised entity, to see how a proliferation security initiative could be misused by one country if it identified a concern in another country and took action on that. I hope that the Minister can bring the House up to date about the proliferation security initiative and how he intends that to work in relation to international legislation and the workings of the UN Security Council.

I conclude with a simple quote that I came across recently. It underlines my feelings on the matter and the conclusions of the hon. Member for Islington, North. It is as follows:

"We must abandon the unworkable notion that it is morally reprehensible for some countries to pursue weapons of mass destruction yet morally acceptable for others to rely on them for security—and indeed to continue to refine their capacities and postulate plans for their use."

The United Kingdom is in that situation. We hold weapons of mass destruction. What is more, we continue to develop them and refine their capacities, and we have plans for their use. If the Government say that there are situations in which they would use nuclear weapons, obviously they postulate plans for their use. That quote came from the same person that the hon. Gentleman quoted in a different context: Muhammed El Baradei, the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency. The quotation was published on 13 February 2004 in the International Herald Tribune.

We are talking about the key question for the review of the non-proliferation treaty. How will the Government approach that review? Will they build on the successes of the treaty so far in at least bringing about the cessation of a particular type of horrid arms race, or will they perpetuate the cold war in another guise? It is time for us as a nation to take the step not only of rejecting the use of nuclear weapons, but of saying positively that we will disarm. The replacement for Trident is the ideal opportunity to take that first step. I hope that the Minister will say—I do not think that he will—that we will not have a replacement for Trident and that we will be taking those steps.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I see two hon. Members rising to speak. We should remember that the purpose of the debate is to enable the hon. Member raising it to get an adequate reply from the Minister. If both hon. Gentlemen are brief, they will be able to speak before the Minister starts his winding-up speech.

2.35 pm

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall speak only for a few minutes. First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing this debate on a most important issue—arguably the most important that faces us. I entirely agree with the two fine speeches that have already been made so I do not need to repeat them, but some of what I say may reinforce them.

The cold war between the Soviet world and the west is now over. Weapons such as Trident were designed for that situation, but even then, I did not accept the necessity of nuclear weapons. I was a member of CND for many years, I marched all the way from Aldermaston in 1962, and many years later I became chair of Trade Union CND, so I have a record in these matters. It is time to decommission Trident and not to replace it—that point has been made. It was designed for a world in which major powers faced each other, not for a world that is dealing with terrorism carried out by persons unknown working within societies. Trident is out of date, irrelevant, extremely expensive and potentially very dangerous.

I agree entirely that we should decommission Trident and become a non-nuclear power. If we did, we would be seen to be the first major power to be moving in a peaceful direction, rather than a warlike one. We would derive great moral respect in the world, and we would then be in a position to speak about peace to the rest of the world. I am not suggesting that we disarm conventionally, because we have a strong role to play using conventional arms—working under the auspices of the UN for peaceful purposes in various parts of the world is a very fine thing. Indeed, some interventions were not made that I think should have been made. Rwanda is one such case: if the UN had got in quickly, and we had sent troops to stop the genocide in Rwanda, that would have been a humane purpose for military activity, and I would have supported it. However, that has nothing to do with nuclear weapons, which have no role to play.

Britain has another role because we were a colonial power—the colonial power, with a footprint in more parts of the world than anyone else. We have links that can be useful. In my constituency are many thousands of constituents from Kashmir, Pakistan and India. The situation in that part of the world is tense and very delicate. It is starting to improve, but Britain could and should have a role. If we take sides in a strong and aggressive way, as we are at the moment, it is more difficult for us to play a conciliation role in those parts of the world.

In Africa, too, there are serious tensions in many states, and some have become non-states because of appalling internal civil wars and violence. We could play a role in Africa under the auspices of the United Nations, because we understand Africa—we have had a greater presence in Africa than any other colonial power. We could play a positive role for peace across the whole of Africa, but we cannot do that if we have a partisan, militaristic role in the world and retain nuclear weapons. We look like a country that is going to wage war, rather than a country that is going to end wars.

I wanted to make those brief points to support my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North and the other hon. Members who have spoken today. The UK has respect in the world—perhaps more respect than we deserve sometimes. Britain still commands respect from many people in the continent of Europe, and the many people from all over the world who live in my constituency. That could be massively enhanced if we chose to be the first major nation to get rid of its nuclear weapons and start to work for peace.

2.39 pm

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing this very timely debate, and on his own excellent and comprehensive speech. I also complement the other speakers and agree with much that has been said.

I believe that the nuclear non-proliferation treaty is the basis of a stable future for our world. I praise the work that the United Kingdom Government played in the 2000 negotiations in bringing countries together in a successful negotiation. If we are to have a safe future, it is vital that the treaty be strengthened. It has been much more successful than many people had anticipated. If one examines the forecasts that experts made in past decades, one finds that they predicted that by now far more countries would have nuclear weapons than has turned out to be the case.

[Mr. Malcolm Savidge]

When we debated this issue in January 2000, we were aware that there was a risk of materials passing from states not only to other states but to terrorists. In the light of 11 September, the awareness has become much stronger. Materials may pass not only from states but from black market or independent agents. There are various concerns about materials remaining in the former Soviet Union and the danger from Pakistan. When we were embarking on the campaign against al-Qaeda, there were fears that it could have obtained personnel or weapons material from Pakistan, through ideological or financial links. The general impression is that, although al-Qaeda attempted to do that, fortunately, it did not succeed. Where terrorism is concerned, we must concentrate on al-Qaeda and related organisations, but we must never forget that the threat is not simply from Islamic fundamentalism. As one can see from the Aum Shinri Kyo sect in Japan, it is possible for other organisations to adopt the sort of extremist terrorism that aims to kill vast numbers of people.

One should be cautious about what one says about Iraq. The present evidence is that Iraq abandoned its nuclear programme, and probably all its weapons of mass destruction, in the 1990s. If that was the case, it suggests that the International Atomic Energy Agency, the NNPT and international pressure were more successful than most of us—myself included—realised. That shows that there are terrible dangers in the neo-conservative concept of resolving such matters through pre-emptive war based on uncertain intelligence. Detestable as it must be to the Prime Minister and many others, I praise his decision to deal with Libya. We have to resolve such matters by negotiation.

On 11 February, President Bush made an important speech on weapons of mass destruction proliferation. I yield to most people in my respect for President Bush, but I admit he said some things that are deserving of special attention. Every civilised nation, he says, has a stake in preventing the spread of weapons of mass destruction. We could go further and say that the whole of humanity has a stake in that. His statement that we should do everything we can to prevent the criminal proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is clearly correct. However, I share the concern that was expressed by the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) that such a policy can include intercepting vessels one thinks are carrying materials. Because of the attitude of some members of the Bush administration, I am concerned that such action could become a cause of war if it were carried out in a cavalier fashion.

We should strengthen national laws, and I am pleased that we have been one of the first countries to take on the additional protocol. I am also pleased that President Bush is now talking about strengthening the Nunn-Lugar arrangements to control and reduce nuclear materials in the former Soviet Union. It was disappointing that he moved away from it at the start of his presidency, but I am pleased that he has moved it back up his agenda and that the world community has fallen into line behind it. We must recognise that civil nuclear production can be diverted to making nuclear weapons: in particular, processes such as enrichment and reprocessing must be controlled.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): My hon. Friend says that national and international laws must be strengthened, but is it not a fact that the United Kingdom is breaking the current law in non-proliferation treaty articles VI and I, and the United States is breaking another international treaty, the chemical weapons convention? He spoke of the willingness of terrorists to carry out mass killings. It is difficult for us to comprehend the horror of some of those events, but, in response to a question of mine, the Government said that in extreme circumstances they would be willing to press the nuclear button—surely the ultimate act of madness. Does my hon. Friend agree, or can he think of a more extreme act of madness than involvement in nuclear conflict?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge) of the time constraints.

Mr. Savidge: I believe that all of us would devote ourselves to trying to ensure that nuclear weapons are never used again. Having visited Hiroshima, I have no doubt about that.

It is important that the International Atomic Energy Agency be strengthened. Suspected violators should not be on the board and we should strengthen the additional protocol. However, the points made by Mr. El Baradei in response to the President must also be considered. The nuclear non-proliferation treaty should be made binding, and we should treat withdrawal far more seriously. There should be no permission for withdrawal from the treaty or, at least, there should be an immediate report to the United Nations Security Council in such an event. We must also recognise the dangers of diversion from the civil nuclear industry and ask whether the spread of that industry increases the safety of our world.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North said, we must consider the non-signatory powers, including India and Pakistan. Obviously, we are very pleased that Mr. Vajpayee and Mr. Musharraf are pursuing a peace process—we hope that it will be successful. Clearly, they should be involved. As has been said, the situation of Israel is a problem, and it is unacceptable for Sharon to say that he is waiting for success in the middle east peace negotiations if he himself is a major block to progress. We should also consider Kofi Annan's proposal for a UN conference on nuclear weapons in which the status of the unofficial nuclear weapons states would be avoided in order to bring them into discussions.

We cannot disregard questions about the nuclear weapons states themselves. I follow the hon. Member for Ceredigion in quoting Mr. El Baradei, who said that we must abandon the notion that "it is morally reprehensible for some countries to pursue weapons of mass destruction yet morally acceptable for others to rely on them".

We must follow the 13 steps drawn up in New York. We promised that we would support a comprehensive test ban treaty and stop testing. The US must adhere to its current moratorium and we must press our ally to consider and sign the comprehensive test ban treaty. It is unacceptable that, although we have said that we will have a missile cut-off treaty, China and the US are blocking it over the issue of weapons in space. It is unacceptable that, although we agreed to strengthen the anti-ballistic missile treaty, it is being abandoned. Missile defence is not helpful to the process that we need.

We must realistically reduce nuclear weapons. We need something far stronger than the Moscow treaty—something that includes irreversibility, is binding, and acts much faster to remove the vast quantities of nuclear weapons materials that no one needs. We therefore need a process that moves fast enough to bring in China, Britain and France.

The Bush Administration should cease talking of breaking negative security guarantees and devising programmes to make nuclear weapons useable. It is unthinkable that they should be talking about mini-nukes for bunker-busting, especially if one remembers poor Colin Powell being pushed out to say that the Administration knew about vast underground bunkers and weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, and how none has so far been found.

We must work together to strengthen the nuclear non-proliferation treaty to reduce the threat of nuclear terrorism and nuclear war and create a safe future. There is no future safety in national military invulnerability. There is safety only in the common security of all states.

2.51 pm

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): I, too, pay tribute to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) for securing a debate on a very important topic. As he pointed out, it is rarely afforded the opportunity of proper discussion in the main Chamber. I also pay tribute to all others who have contributed. They, in their different ways, have long and established campaigning records on these issues, and bring much expertise to the debate.

A recurring theme this afternoon has been the self-evident truth that the nuclear non-proliferation treaty is the cornerstone of international arrangements to reduce the threat of nuclear war and keep the world secure. For a period after the end of the cold war, people thought that the dangers had passed. The events of the past few years have indicated that the world is not as safe a place as we hoped. An element of complacency in the 1990s has been replaced with real fears about the spread of nuclear weapons and a new risk that, in time, terrorists or other non-state actors will get hold of the technology and capability for nuclear weapons.

When we examine the context in which the non-proliferation treaty will be reviewed in a year's time—as the hon. Member for Islington, North said, there is an important conference in a few weeks' time—we can see that there has been a mixed set of circumstances on the non-proliferation issue in the past year. There has been a mixture of some delight and a great deal of concern. In Libya, we have seen a real breakthrough. As the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge) commented, there is some difficulty with the concept of dealing with Gaddafi and his regime and never losing sight of the terrible events of Lockerbie. On the other hand, we have seen the rewards of a patient process in which the Government and others have participated, and the events of the past year, with missiles being shipped safely away from Libya, represent real progress.

Equally, there have been real concerns. The good news in Libya stripped away some of the difficulties of seeing the modern nuclear reality. We quickly saw the situation in Pakistan and the revelation of the virtual international bazaar that Dr. Abdul Qadeer Khan was operating, spreading nuclear know-how around the world. We should be very worried to see many of the countries that he was dealing with in the possession of such knowledge. Know-how and technology are moving around, and there are parallel concerns in Pakistan about the safety and security of its nuclear arsenal. As has been mentioned, Pakistan, India and Israel are not members of the non-proliferation treaty regime. Given the new context in which we operate, it would be useful if the Minister told us what steps might be taken to allow Pakistan and others to come closer to membership of and compliance with the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Alongside Pakistan, we have concerns about North Korea, which is perhaps the most dangerous situation that is facing us. In the past year there have been threats, counter-threats and many periods of stand-off. Last year's announcement that North Korea was withdrawing from the NPT was worrying, but we must hope that, once again, multi-lateral diplomacy will be successful in drawing it into compliance with the treaty.

Events closer to the domestic political agenda of the past year have put a focus on the middle east. I will not rehearse again the questions and points that have been raised about Iraq. However, the prospect of a nuclear war that is started somewhere in the middle east remains real. It is vital that we get Israel signing up to the non-proliferation treaty as a non-nuclear state, allowing us to move towards the creation of a middle east that is free from such weapons.

Iran, in its own way, has brought itself to the public's attention. I shall return to that in a moment. There has been a series of responses from the world community. One of the key areas that needs further examination is counter-proliferation and the role of our intelligence services; they are the subject of severe scrutiny in the United Kingdom at the moment. We need to see their role in working with other international agencies strengthened. The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) mentioned the proliferation security initiative. We would welcome anything that will enhance security, although I recognise some of the dangers to which he alluded. The Foreign Secretary, in his written statement to the House of Commons in February, referred, in the context of the global partnership against nuclear proliferation, about the prospect of establishing a UN Security Council committee along the lines of the Counter-Terrorism Committee. Has that particular initiative been taken forward and what progress has been made on it? Similarly, there was mention in that statement of the desirability of a new United Nations Security Council resolution. We would support such an initiative and I hope that the Minister will have something to report to us about it.

[Mr. Michael Moore]

I mentioned Iran. The peaceful use of a nuclear capability is something that is important to many countries. The agonising about the status of Iran's nuclear capabilities has been causing much concern in the past few months; there must be genuine concerns about the nature of its nuclear programme. Its announcement that it has suspended enrichment activities is welcome, but it is equally worrying that it has been unwilling to agree to the inspections that were requested by the international community. I pay tribute to the Government, who were working in league with France and Germany, for the way in which their diplomatic efforts have made progress in the past few months. I hope that, working in tandem with the United States, we may yet see an early resolution of that issue.

Previous speakers have made contributions about disarmament. I would merely say that we welcome the steps that have been taken. Serious progress has been made since 1997. However, we must hope that there will be further progress under this Government. In particular, we must hope for a recognition that if no further steps are taken by the existing nuclear powers, our credibility with those who have them illegally—in the context of the treaty—or with those who aspire to have them will not be great.

This is a brief debate and many serious issues have yet to be fully discussed, but I hope that the Minister will give a strong signal that the Government remain committed to pressing the non-proliferation agenda and that in the coming review of the treaty they will take a lead in making the world a safe place.

3 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): I also congratulate the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing the debate. He and I may not always agree, but with great passion and conviction he brings to the attention of the House important issues on a variety of subjects and, as a Conservative Member of Parliament, I freely acknowledge that.

I also congratulate all the speakers who have contributed to this afternoon's debate. As others have said, it is important that at this time, in the light of recent revelations about proliferation and a month before the final preparatory committee meeting for the 2005 review, we debate the issue, which is crucial for global security and stability. The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is a vast issue, so I shall concentrate on the narrower subject before us today in a broader context.

The fact is that some countries possess nuclear weapons or other weapons of mass destruction and the apparent inequality of such a situation inevitably generates a desire for others to possess them also, whether to establish their status in a global or regional context or to possess so-called deterrents against other countries already in possession of them. Those are two often-cited factors when considering Iran's nuclear activities.

Recent revelations about the activities of Abdul Qadeer Khan in Pakistan, Libya and North Korea have caused questions to be asked about the suitability of the 1970 non-proliferation treaty for the proliferations challenges of the 21st century. The NPT legitimised the five nuclear powers' arsenals and forbade further proliferation, but does not contain provisions to penalise those who would not sign and who are technically not subject to treaty rules, such as India, Pakistan and Israel. It also allowed any signatory the right to use nuclear materials for peaceful purposes, and that is very grey territory because the development of a nuclear capability for some purposes can be transferred to a more aggressive posture in other circumstances.

The objective of the treaty, which was originally agreed for 25 years but was extended indefinitely in 1995, was full nuclear disarmament. That remains its ultimate objective and was reaffirmed in the 1995 review and extension conference, at the 2000 review conference and in preparatory committee sessions for the 2005 review. The NPT was the essential foundation for the pursuit of nuclear disarmament, and ideas such as nuclear-free or weapons of mass destruction-free regions are being advanced at the moment, particularly in respect of the middle east; they deserve careful consideration.

The NPT has achieved successes and we should not downplay the role that it has played in limiting proliferation. However, while the need to counter the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction has always been great, it has never been more important than it is today. Historically, potentially belligerent states in possession of large nuclear arsenals were the main problem; today it is failed states, rogue states run by unaccountable regimes that do not always act rationally, and terrorist groups that represent the most potent threat to global security. The so-called traditional risk has not gone away—witness the near-nuclear conflict in Kashmir only a few years ago—but the treaty must seek effectively to address the new threats as well.

Recent developments in Libya have been alluded to and the decision to reveal and dismantle its programme is welcome although, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) stated, experience teaches us to be wary of Colonel Gaddafi's promises until they are delivered. Many unresolved issues remain between the United Kingdom and Libya. Important facts have been brought to light that highlight the complexity of the global proliferation networks, of which we were unaware, and the ways that the NPT has been circumvented.

The activities of Abdul Qadeer Khan have done a lot of damage to non-proliferation efforts. With a web of contacts and middlemen spreading throughout the middle east, parts of Europe, across the Indian subcontinent and into Asia, it is imperative that we now draw together all the available intelligence so that we can identify and pursue every contact in the web and form an accurate picture of what technology and knowledge has been passed on to which countries, regimes or even terrorist groups. The risks posed by the new proliferators, including those from the former Soviet Union, are real.

Iran's nuclear programme remains a concern to us. It is clear that Iran has breached nuclear safeguards and rules; that has been going on for 18 years. It has also refused to disclose important aspects of its nuclear programme. Those breaches are serious, and it is right that the IAEA passed a resolution reflecting that. However, Iran has now started co-operating with the IAEA, and I hope that that continues and is built upon.

The situation in North Korea has been mentioned. It is arguably the most worrying consequence of proliferation that a totalitarian regime making very bellicose noises should possess nuclear capability. That is beyond the scope of the NPT to remedy. A firm stance coupled with the prospect of talks to remove the problem must be pursued. China's efforts to defuse the situation and tackle North Korea's nuclear status deserve our gratitude and support.

In the light of recent events, many people, including Mr. El Baradei of the IAEA, have begun to raise serious questions about whether the NPT is as effective and well suited to modern needs as it should be. He recently alluded to that in an article in The Economist. He stated that many countries that signed the NPT have yet to effect the safeguard agreement with the IAEA; fewer than 20 per cent. of them have finalised the 1997 additional protocol allowing for broader inspections and, seemingly, a culture of a reluctance to move first has developed. As he notes, hardware for nuclear energy production is at present often dual-use, which makes monitoring difficult.

With such proliferation of knowledge, does the Minister agree that the current framework for verification and regulation requires updating? Does he also agree that the processing of weapons-usable material, such as separated plutonium, in civilian nuclear programmes should now be restricted? Does he believe that proliferation-resistant energy system technology has been sufficiently developed to be considered for inclusion in all civilian nuclear programmes? Will he be pressing for the development of such processes to be a priority?

Much of what I have said is about how to prevent future proliferation rather than how to tackle proliferation that has already occurred, as this debate focuses on the treaty review. It is not about tackling new, or near, nuclear states, which are subjects in themselves. I hope that the Minister can assure us that the UK will play a full and active role in the 2005 review, as it did in past ones, and that it will give serious consideration to the views expressed here today.

In many ways today's world is more unpredictable than that of the cold war era in which the NPT was conceived. Proliferation is one of the causes of that unpredictability. We must ensure that the NPT adequately addresses the proliferation challenges of today.

3.9 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on securing the debate; the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) stole the words that I was going to use in responding to him. What I have to say is not diplomatic flannel, although that is a necessity from time to time for Foreign Office Ministers; although there are disagreements on issues, there is wide regard and respect for the integrity with which my hon. Friend pursues his views on these matters. I was struck by the comments that he and other hon. Members made about the appalling horrors that could accompany nuclear configuration, and in that context the important debate is about how we ensure that we avoid that situation. Those judgments are not easy, and that is what divides the debate. It is important that we take this opportunity to discuss those issues, particularly within the context of the non-proliferation treaty, its review and British participation.

We believe that the NPT is the corner-stone of the non-proliferation regime, and we are committed to working towards a world safer from global terrorism and weapons of mass destruction. The NPT has been, is and should be in future a crucial tool for helping us to do that. We remain fully committed to the treaty and look forward to participating in the review.

The NPT is already a strong treaty. As the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) said, it already has a good track record in thwarting the proliferation of nuclear weapons. It has the widest membership of any arms control treaty and it retains the wholehearted support of the United Kingdom and the vast majority of the international community. We are committed to strengthening it in the face of the challenges posed by the new security environment.

I am somewhat younger than I look. I am a child of the cold war and I grew up with the real and constant fear of nuclear war. Some of the challenges that we face today are even more terrifying than those that we faced during that divide between east and west.

We must look to all international instruments and treaties at our disposal. With that in mind, the UK's main goal for the forthcoming 2004 PrepCom and the 2005 review conference will be to emphasise the need for greater efforts in the non-proliferation and compliance areas of the treaty. The events of the past year have shown that several states continue to seek clandestine nuclear weapons programmes and that individuals are willing to assist them in the proliferation of sensitive materials and technology. The treaty must therefore be strengthened and the political will generated to prevent that.

Before I go any further, it is worth putting on the record the considerable progress that we have made in nuclear disarmament. People involved in the debate do not often acknowledge it, but our record is good. We played a key role in achieving international agreement to the final document that was produced at the previous NPT review conference in 2000.

The UK has made considerable progress on the "13 practical steps towards nuclear disarmament" set out in the document. For example, we have begun a programme to develop UK expertise in verifying the reduction and elimination of nuclear weapons internationally. At the second meeting of the preparatory committee for the 2005 review conference, held in Geneva during April and May last year, we issued a working paper on the authentication of warheads and their components. At the third meeting of the committee in New York this year, we will present the next part of the study, which looks at verification technologies and their potential use in warhead dismantling. Those are some of the critical areas in which we must make progress.

Llew Smith: Could the Minister explain how Trident fits into those steps towards nuclear disarmament?

Mr. Rammell: If my hon. Friend will wait, I will happily address Trident, as I did directly to him in the Chamber last week.

At the 2005 review conference we will summarise the range of technologies and approaches that have been researched over the five-year programme. The work will provide the basis for methodologies that might be used in the verification regime of any future disarmament treaty.

I will address the issues that have been raised by hon. Members before I return to the central thrust of my speech. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North rightly raised concerns about those states that do not operate in the auspices of the non-proliferation treaty in which there is a concern about nuclear weapons capability. We continue strongly to urge Israel, India and Pakistan to accede to the NPT as non-nuclear weapon states. There is no equivocation about that. It is a view that we constantly put forward.

Both my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Ceredigion raised concerns about national missile defence. It is important to make it abundantly clear what we have, and have not, agreed to. In February 2003, after significant public and parliamentary discussion, the United Kingdom agreed to the United States' request to upgrade and use RAF Fylingdales' early warning radar for missile defence. That upgrade keeps open the prospect of our acquiring missile defence capabilities should we desire such protection in future. However, we have not decided to join the US missile defence programme. That is a decision that is still open to us and there should be ample opportunities for it to continue to be discussed.

There has been significant questioning, which was similar to the questioning from my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith), on the issue of the circumstances in which we would be prepared to use the nuclear weapons that we possess. It is important to make it clear that the circumstances in which any use of nuclear weapons might have to be contemplated are extremely remote. That is consistent with what the Secretary of State for Defence said. We would use nuclear weapons only in extreme circumstances of self-defence and in accordance with our obligations under international law. I think that that is a reassurance that should go forward.

Mr. Simon Thomas: Can the hon. Gentleman confirm that those circumstances categorically rule out a pre-emptive use of nuclear weapons?

Mr. Rammell: We need there to be some uncertainty on the part of those states that might seek to attack us about our disposal in defending ourselves. Nevertheless, as I have made clear, we would use nuclear weapons only in extreme circumstances of self-defence and strictly in accordance with our obligations under international law.

A question that has been put forward this afternoon concerns our stance on a comprehensive test ban treaty and whether we are in favour of other countries signing up to it. Emphatically, yes that is the case. My noble Friend Baroness Symons spoke at the CTBT conference held in Vienna in September 2003. She took the opportunity to urge all states that had not yet signed and ratified the treaty to do so. That is the position that we maintain today.

The issue of the proliferation security initiative was also raised by the hon. Member for Ceredigion, who asked how that related to existing non-proliferation treaties and regimes. That is an important area for discussion and clarification. There are a number of tools at our disposal to prevent the spread of weapons of mass destruction. The aim of the proliferation security initiative is to build on and reinforce those existing tools, not—explicitly—to supplant them. The PSI builds on the 1992 UN Security Council declaration on proliferation of WMD, which states that the proliferation of all WMD constitutes a threat to international peace and security and underlines the need for member states of the UN to prevent proliferation.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion also raised the legal basis of the issue. The statement of interdiction principles that was agreed at the Paris PSI meeting on 4 September 2003 makes it clear that all action will be consistent with existing national legal authorities and the international legal framework. There is a large body of authority for undertaking interdiction operations, such as those involving actions in territorial waters, airspace or land or by flag states against vessels operating under their flags.

To those people who have a strong track record of campaigning against nuclear weapons, I say that I respect their integrity and motives but am sometimes puzzled as to why, given that commitment, there are concerns about initiatives such as the PSI, which is a legitimate and justifiable move to stop the proliferation of nuclear capability and its spread, both to states that could use it extremely irresponsibly and to non-state actors and terrorists who could greatly increase the risks that we face.

Jeremy Corbyn: I think, if I may say so, that the concerns that many of us have are about unilateral actions by nuclear powers, such as the US intercepting the vessel travelling from Korea to Yemen. We would much prefer an international inspection agency and interception process, and Muhammed El Baradei would confirm that.

Mr. Rammell: I think that case can be argued. To refer to the comments of the hon. Member for Ceredigion, we are certainly talking about a coalition of the willing who are rightly prepared to move forward on the issue. In time, the matter may well come under the auspices of wider international agreement. However, the fundamental point must be made that the proliferation security initiative is based on the sound principle of trying to stop the spread of nuclear weapons and other WMD capability, and preventing it from getting into the hands of people who would have absolutely no compunction in using it and causing disaster to the whole world in a genuinely horrifying way.

I return to some of the broad issues and the UK's progress on disarmament under NPT article VI. We remain fully committed to all aspects of the NPT, including global and verifiable nuclear disarmament. We have an excellent record in fulfilling our NPT obligations. In some senses, as my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) acknowledged, we are the most forward-leaning of the nuclear weapon states.

Specifically, we have undertaken a number of actions, particularly in the past six and a half years, that have made significant progress. First, we have withdrawn and dismantled the RAF's freeform nuclear bomb, so that Trident is now our only nuclear weapons system. We dismantled the last Chevaline warhead in 2002, demonstrating our commitment to irreversibility in the reduction of the UK's nuclear weapons. We have reduced our operationally available stockpile to fewer than 200 warheads. That is a reduction of more than 70 per cent. in the potential explosive power of our nuclear forces since the end of the cold war—a significant development, in my view.

We have also rightly reduced the readiness of our nuclear forces. A single Trident submarine is now on deterrent patrol, carrying 48 warheads. The submarine on patrol is normally on several days' "notice to fire", and its missiles are de-targeted. That, too, is a significant de-escalatory move. We have rightly signed and ratified the comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty. As I said, we continue to promote its early entry into force.

The Government's policy on nuclear weapons remains as it was when it was set out in the 1998 strategic defence review and the 2003 defence White Paper. We are committed to working towards a safer world in which there is no requirement for nuclear weapons, and we continue to play a full role in international efforts to strengthen arms control and prevent the proliferation of chemical, biological and nuclear weapons.

However, the continuing risk from the proliferation of nuclear weapons, and the certainty that a number of other countries will retain substantial nuclear arsenals, means that our minimum deterrent capability, currently represented by Trident, is likely to remain a necessary element of our security for the present. Nevertheless, we will continue to support multilateral negotiations towards mutual, balanced and verifiable reductions in nuclear weapons worldwide. When we are satisfied that sufficient progress has been made to allow us to include British nuclear weapons in any negotiations without endangering our security interests, we will certainly do so.

We live in an uncertain world, and the NPT certainly faces challenges from states of concern such as Iran. We believe that the global community needs to strengthen the NPT by ensuring full compliance by such states. The UK is continuing to work in collaboration with the international community to ensure that Iran operates within its obligations under the NPT. We have also worked with the United States to secure a significant and historic agreement with Libya to renounce its clandestine nuclear weapons programme. Both those efforts demonstrate our clear commitment to strengthening the non-proliferation regime.

Let me take up the proposals on strengthening the international non-proliferation regime, which were laid before the House by the Foreign Secretary on 25 February. In addressing these issues I should like to begin by considering the NPT and the IAEA. Non-nuclear weapon states that are party to the NPT are obliged to enter into safeguard agreements with the IAEA to verify that there is no diversion of nuclear activities from peaceful uses to nuclear weapons, or other nuclear explosive devices. States that fail to comply with their safeguard obligations inevitably lose the confidence of the international community—which is a concern for all of us—and the bargain that is at the heart of the treaty is fundamentally called into question. We should consider whether such states should forfeit the right to develop the nuclear fuel cycle, particularly the enrichment and reprocessing capabilities, which are of such proliferation sensitivity. That does not mean that they would be deprived of the possibility of constructing and running civil nuclear power stations, which could still operate with fuel supplied by countries that honoured their safeguard obligations.

Experience in recent years has shown the need for more wide-ranging IAEA inspections of national nuclear industries. The agency's additional protocol provides the basis for carrying out such inspections. It is important that all members of the international community adopt one. Suppliers of nuclear technology should increasingly regard that as a key commitment when they judge export licence applications.

As I said, international security is jeopardised by the risks of the proliferation of nuclear materials and expertise. The recent exposure of the A. Q. Khan network has fundamentally highlighted those serious risks and concerns. We must remain focused on that threat, which is why we are committed to initiatives such as the global partnership, which is an important step forward, and the proliferation security initiative, which was launched in May 2003. That has an important and fundamental role to play in preventing the trafficking in weapons of mass destruction and related technology by state and non-state actors, such as terrorist groups or criminal networks, through increased interdiction efforts.

I said earlier that those who campaign, rightly, against nuclear weapons should take up the cause of the proliferation security initiative. There is also an argument that can be made in respect of some of those regimes, such as North Korea, that may possess nuclear weapons and are not—or claim that they are not—party to the NPT. I agree with a number of the comments that have been made about the serious concerns that exist within North Korea. I am puzzled sometimes by the way in which anti-nuclear campaigners rightly challenge, criticise and scrutinise this and other Governments, yet when there is an example of a country—such as North Korea in the past 18 months—that is seeking completely to disregard its non-proliferation obligations I do not hear the same voices raised in protest.

Jeremy Corbyn: I would like the Minister to be fully aware that those who campaign for nuclear disarmament and nuclear peace do so in every country around the world, including North Korea.

Mr. Rammell: I respect the integrity of my hon. Friend's position, but perhaps he will go back through the record of parliamentary questions, both oral and written, on this issue in the past 18 months. I have not heard the level of concern on proliferation in North Korea that I have heard in other areas of the world. There must be some even-handedness and balance on these issues.

There is a fundamental concern, which is that the UN Security Council has not discussed proliferation since 1992—a period of 12 years, during which these processes have been ongoing. I warmly welcome the debate that is currently taking place about a draft resolution on proliferation, which would seek the adoption of tough national legislation to criminalise the possession, manufacture and trafficking of weapons of mass destruction. Our discussion is very timely. I hope that the Security Council will be in a position to pass that resolution very soon.

This has been an exceedingly good debate. We have had an opportunity to air these issues fully. There are real, genuine concerns that we need to continue to address. We need to go forward multilaterally and seek the nuclear disarmament to which every Member of this House aspires.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank hon. Members for co-operating and enabling every Member who wished to take part in the debate to do so.

UK Citizens (Guantanamo Bay)

3.30 pm

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise this subject. It is not my argument that the four British citizens held by the United States at Guantanamo bay are necessarily innocent of terrorism—I am in no position to know. We do know, however, that the five who were released, who had been held for some time by the United States, have not been charged for any offence since returning here. I accept that that, in itself, does not mean that the four in question are innocent of any involvement in terrorism. The point is that if the four United Kingdom citizens are to be tried in the United States, the legal process should be in accordance with the recognised law and international standards of democratic countries. Our Foreign Office Ministers and Law Officers should continue to pursue that in talks with the US authorities.

I share the concern that if any or all four of the detainees are charged, they will, as things stand, be tried before a military commission. Apparently, that method of trying people in America applies only to non-US citizens. For instance, members of the US armed services have the right to appeal against a sentence imposed by a court martial to an independent civilian court. Those tried before a military commission, including the British citizens, have no such right of appeal. What happens in such cases is that any guilty verdict is reviewed by a panel of military officers. Once a decision of guilt has been established, such findings go to the Defence Secretary and either he or the President of the United States gives the final confirmation of the decision. There is no right to any kind of independent court.

Moreover, if the four were to be found not guilty, would they automatically be released and allowed to come out of detention? If they are tried before a military commission and found not guilty, will they be released and allowed to leave the United States? It will be interesting to hear the answer to that.

After representations made by the British Government, will the four will be able to choose their own lawyers? That is an important point. The right to choose one's lawyer is a feature of any democratic society. In the United States, for example, those from the armed services who are charged and appear before a court martial have some choice. If the four detainees are to have their own lawyers, what about payment? I understand that it would be necessary for defendants in those circumstances to pay lawyers who, certainly in the United States, do not come cheap. What will happen if they are free to choose their own lawyers, but are not in the position to fund such services?

There is another question about lawyers. Lawyers who appear before the military commission need security clearance and difficulties could arise in such circumstances. If security clearance is very restrictive, would the lawyers acting for the four—if they are allowed to have lawyers of their own choosing—be so restricted that they would not have the information that defence lawyers normally have?

Following the representations made by the British Government, I know that the four are not going to be sentenced to death even if they are found guilty. That is a useful fact to know, especially for those involved. Nevertheless, if they were to be found guilty by a military commission in the absence of a death sentence, the sentence could be very heavy indeed. That is all the more reason why the defence lawyers should have the necessary information to do the very best for their clients.

Will the proceedings take place in public or in camera, or will they be split between the two? It is important that the whole proceedings are in public. I would have thought that all parties would have similar thoughts on the matter. My hon. Friend the Minister may remember that when he first made a statement on the situation, before anyone had been released, there was a great deal of criticism from all parties on the way in which the United States intended to act. As we know, five have now been released, but there is much sensitivity on the matter, and rightly so.

I hope that I take the acute threat of international terrorism no less seriously than anyone else. My loathing of acts of terror is second to none. Indeed, for 30 years I took every opportunity to condemn the terrorists. In Birmingham, not very far from my constituency, the IRA committed a terrible act of terror in which some 21 people were murdered in November 1974. That is apart from all the other acts of terror that the IRA committed in Northern Ireland and England. While condemning such acts, as well as those carried out by its loyalist counterparts, I sometimes wonder whether those in the United States—what is sometimes described as the Irish lobby—took the same view of the seriousness of terrorism as we did. When it comes to terrorism, my point is clear: we require no lessons from anyone on the subject. We loathe terrorism and we loathe the threat to our people.

We know where the Prime Minister is at the moment. He is rightly paying tribute to the memory of those who were slaughtered in Madrid a fortnight ago. Nevertheless, international opinion, not least in the Arab world, needs to be persuaded that if the four, or any of the other detainees of various nationalities, are found guilty, the legal process will be just and be seen to be so. I am afraid that the proposed way to try those people, whether they are innocent or guilty, is not likely to achieve that aim, or to come anywhere near it. More safeguards are necessary.

If the four were to be charged—they have not been at the moment—it would be far better if they appeared as defendants in a proper court of law in the United States. They should have lawyers of their own choosing and the defence counsel should have all the facilities that defence counsels normally have in the United States and other democracies. If, at the end of it all, they were found guilty, there would be the feeling in this country and probably in the wider world that the due processes of justice had been undertaken. As it stands, what is being proposed is not satisfactory. I hope that Ministers and the Law Officers in this country do their utmost to persuade the United States of the seriousness of the matter.

3.40 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Chris Mullin): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick) for raising this subject and for giving me an opportunity to reiterate the Government's position on the British detainees at Guantanamo bay. In doing so, I want to emphasise two points. First, we have done more than any other Government to look after the interests of our citizens detained at Guantanamo bay and we will continue to do so in respect of the remaining four prisoners.

Secondly, although I accept that many aspects of the treatment of terrorist suspects at Guantanamo bay have been far from satisfactory, we must remain mindful of the unique circumstances in which the detentions arose. I am sure that my hon. Friend is mindful of that. The threat posed by al-Qaeda is unprecedented. In responding to it, Governments have had the difficult task of balancing the demands of civil liberties against the threat posed by an enemy that is extremely cunning, ruthless and utterly without scruple. That has given rise to some difficult dilemmas. I know that my hon. Friend, who, while being a strong upholder of civil liberties, is second to no one, as he says, in his detestation of terrorism, will appreciate those difficulties.

My hon. Friend asked whether the detainees would have access to their own civilian lawyers. We understand that they will, but that those lawyers must come from a list of civilian lawyers approved by the US Department of Defence. He asked who would pay and whether it would be the British Government. My understanding is that the US will not pay for the appointment of a civilian lawyer, but that a military lawyer will be provided in each case. We are considering what advice we can provide on finding qualified civilian lawyers. It would not be appropriate for Her Majesty's Government to provide financial assistance to pay for the lawyers as that is not done in the many other cases in which British nationals are prosecuted abroad. It is not our practice to fund legal assistance for any British nationals facing trial overseas. However, we will be able to provide assistance with finding qualified lawyers.

Let me return to my first point. No Government have done more for their citizens detained at Guantanamo bay than the British Government, both during the detention of the nine men and in seeking to bring about their return. We have been in frequent and regular contact with the United States authorities concerning the British detainees. From the outset we sought to ensure their welfare and actively encouraged the United States Government to resolve their position. British officials have visited Guantanamo bay seven times. We have kept the families and Parliament informed of the detainees' circumstances and of other related developments.

In July 2003, two of the British detainees were designated by the United States authorities as eligible to stand trial by military commission. The commission had been established to prosecute the detainees. The British Government made it clear from the outset that we had concerns about the military commission process and consequently my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister asked the Attorney-General to discuss with the United States authorities how the detainees, if prosecuted, could be assured of fair trials that met international standards. In parallel to that, the Prime Minister talked to President Bush and the Foreign Secretary discussed the matter many times with his opposite number, the US Secretary of State, Colin Powell. Extensive discussions have been held between British and United States Government lawyers and officials. Those discussions have involved many complex issues of law and security, which both Governments have had to consider carefully.

Although the discussions have made significant progress, the view of the Attorney-General was that the military commission, as constituted, would not provide the type of process that we would afford to British nationals. We have been attempting to ensure that the legal process will respect the human rights of the detainees, including the right to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal, established by law. As we know, five of the detainees have been released and have returned home. As for the remaining four detainees, we and the United States authorities are continuing to discuss a range of security matters and other issues. As a result of our talks, US legal procedures against Mr. Abbasi and Mr. Begg were suspended in July and, as my hon. Friend remarks, the United States said that the men would not be subject to the death penalty, and that remains the case.

Our overall position remains that the detainees should either be tried in accordance with international standards or returned to the United Kingdom. That is the basis on which we are working and on which we shall continue to work.

David Winnick: Is it the wish of the British Government that, given the opportunity offered in respect of the United States authorities, the detainees could be returned and that the authorities in Britain would decide, as they did with the five detainees, whether any charges should be made? Would that not be the Government's first preference? The detainees are British citizens and we were involved in Afghanistan, so it is not a separate matter from the United States. If the detainees are to be tried in the United States, will a military commission definitely be involved? Will the United States relent on that? Will my hon. Friend deal with the matter of an appeal if the verdict is guilty? If the detainees are found not guilty and acquitted, will they be released from detention and allowed to leave the country?

Mr. Mullin: On my hon. Friend's first point, our position remains the one that I just enunciated, which is that the detainees should either be tried in accordance with international standards in the United States or returned to the United Kingdom. As for whether they would be prosecuted were they to be returned to the United Kingdom, that is a matter for the police and the Crown Prosecution Service, not the Government. I am sorry, but I have forgotten his third point.

David Winnick: Is it the wish of the Government that the remaining detainees should be returned to the United Kingdom as the other five have been and that the authorities here should decide whether any charges are to be made? If they are returned and charges are made against them, and it was only right and proper that they should be charged, there would be no question about the legal processes involved. We are happy with the legal processes in our country.

Mr. Mullin: I dealt with that. If the detainees are to be tried in the United States, which remains a strong possibility, they should be tried in accordance with international standards. Were they to be returned to the United Kingdom—in the event either of their acquittal or because they were not to be tried in the United States—the matter of whether they would be prosecuted here would be for the police and the CPS to decide. It is not one on which I can comment.

I now recall that my hon. Friend's third point was whether the commission is still the most likely form of trial. At present, the answer is yes, but the precise terms on which the trial would take place under a military commission have yet to be determined. Discussions about that are continuing.

Let me deal with the extraordinary circumstances in which the detentions arose. The attacks on 11 September were the most appalling terrorist atrocity that the world had ever seen. More than 3,000 people, including 67 British citizens, were killed. In response to those attacks, as my hon. Friend knows, a coalition of countries came together to launch a military campaign against al-Qaeda and its Taliban supporters to remove them from their strongholds in Afghanistan.

In those operations, thousands of individuals believed to be al-Qaeda or Taliban fighters, or their supporters, were detained by coalition forces. The vast majority were released, but those who were deemed to pose a substantial risk of returning to conflict—about 800 people so far—were sent by the United States to Guantanamo bay to be detained and questioned about their knowledge of al-Qaeda activities. As a result, valuable information has been gained that has helped to protect the international community from further terrorist attacks.

David Winnick: What happened on 11 September was a terrible tragedy. I was in the United States on a private visit that week, so I know how the American people reacted. I spoke to a gathering on the evening of 11 September in which I made it clear that the United Kingdom would stand by the United States. However, is it not a matter of some interest that the five who were detained were held for a long time—two years—yet when they returned to the UK, no charge was made against them?

Mr. Mullin: I have said that the Government regard many aspects of the Guantanamo bay experience to be unsatisfactory. I outlined the detailed discussions that we have held at all levels with the United States. So far, they have resulted in five of our citizens being returned and then released, and discussions about the remaining four are ongoing.

It is easy to criticise Guantanamo bay, and we are critical of some aspects of it. It is difficult to maintain a balance between a country's security and the protection of its civil liberties in the struggle against the menace of international terrorism, of which the recent horror in Madrid is only the latest example. That is a balance that we must strike. The Home Secretary has been open about that. He published a discussion paper entitled "Counter-Terrorism Powers: Reconciling Security and Liberty in an Open Society". I commend that to hon. Members, because it sets out some of the dilemmas that we are addressing.

I encourage colleagues to consider the issues surrounding Guantanamo bay in that light, and to contribute to the debate on how we should address the various dilemmas that arise from the need to protect the security of our citizens while, at the same time, safeguarding fundamental freedoms that we all rightly cherish.

EU Constitution

4 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): It is a great pleasure to be here and to deal with an issue covered by the Bill that I presented to the House of Commons the day before yesterday. Curiously, I have just had the pleasure in the European Scrutiny Committee of meeting the Speaker of the Slovakian Parliament, who indicated that, enthusiastic as Slovakia is about becoming a member of the European Union, it is concerned about the parliamentary democracy of nation states in the EU. I mention that because it reflects some of the concerns that I have been pressing for some 18 years, almost from the time that I first came into the House.

I should like to say how sad we are about the recent tragic bereavement suffered by the Minister for Europe. We are sorry that he cannot be here, but more than understand why. I am grateful to the Minister for Trade and Investment for coming instead.

Until very recently, because of the passing of the European Communities Act 1972, a Bill such as mine would have been useful for reaffirming that the United Kingdom Parliament's laws prevailed over European laws, but it would not have been essential. It now is. The sovereignty of Parliament is the guarantee of British voters' democratic freedom. Parliament needs reform to bring it back to its objectives, and it is now in mortal danger. We must remind the courts that they owe allegiance to the Queen in Parliament and to the voters of this country. It is said that judges are appointed quamdiu se bene gesserit—that is, so long as they behave—in the national interest for which they were appointed, and in accordance, of course, with the proper procedures and laws that they are called on to interpret.

What does my Bill do and why is it now essential? It is a very simple, two-clause Bill that provides that European treaties and laws shall be binding in the courts of the UK only to the extent that they do not conflict with any subsequent Act or statutory instrument of the UK Parliament that expressly declares that any such subsequent enactment shall take effect notwithstanding the 1972 Act. That is to say that Parliament prescribes and the courts must back it. That is the crucible.

My Bill is now urgent because the European constitution has been back at the top of the agenda since the new pro-constitution Spanish Government came to power. Ironically, the Poles are alone yet again. The United Kingdom must therefore reassume the leading democratic role in Europe, as it did in the dark days, even if the circumstances have changed from military aggression to European legislative manoeuvre.

The European constitution not only reasserts the primacy of European laws, but also asserts the primacy of the European constitution over the constitutions of the United Kingdom and other member states. It gives the European Court of Justice the role of superior jurisdiction over both, as well as over our newly proposed supreme court, which explains why it is being driven through in the Constitutional Reform Bill, currently in the House of Lords, before the constitution is enacted. The European Court of Justice, with its ever-increasing arrogation of judge-made law, will, in effect, also have power to strike down Acts of the United Kingdom Parliament that are inconsistent with the vast range of the constitution. Indeed, the director general of the European Union legal service and legal counsel to the intergovernmental conference, Mr. Piris, stated:

"The Court of Justice cannot declare that a national law is void because it breaches EU law; it can only declare that the Member State concerned has infringed EU law."

If the constitution goes through, the situation against national laws will be damagingly aggravated.

The practical consequences of the current role of the European Court of Justice are that if it declares an infringement, our courts are bound to give effect to that judgment under section 2 of the 1972 Act. For example, the Merchant Shipping Act 1988 was struck down by our courts. The UK Parliament is, as a result of the 1972 Act, obliged to legislate to achieve conformity with EU legislation and the treaty obligations. My Bill says that if, on behalf of our electorate, we decide not to do so, and therefore decide not to subscribe to those treaty obligations but to insist on our own legislation, our judges must apply and uphold that subsequent and inconsistent Act of Parliament, provided that it is clear and unambiguous. By that I mean inconsistent with the European Communities Act 1972 and the Community instruments, treaties and obligations.

Lord Woolf's insistence that the UK supreme court should not be empowered to strike down UK Acts might be because he wants that to be reserved to the European Court of Justice, as clearly both the Prime Minister and his chum the hapless Charles Falconer—the noble Lord Chancellor—intend. Let us remember that Acts derive their authority from the voters, and it is no wonder that we need a referendum on the constitution. If the Prime Minister continues to refuse one and drives the constitution through Parliament on a three-line Whip, without specific manifesto authority, the Conservative party must promise a referendum if and when the constitution is enacted, and in any event.

I have argued the dangers of all that for years, in particular in the past two years as shadow Attorney-General and shadow Minister for Constitutional Affairs, and in my most recent pamphlet "The European Constitution—A Political Timebomb". That was published last October and I am now publishing a new one, "The Strangulation of Britain and British Business". They both illustrate the need for the reassertion of parliamentary sovereignty over European laws and the acquis communautaire, and the obligation of UK courts to give effect to the latest Acts that are inconsistent with such laws, provided they are clear and unambiguous.

The issue came to a head last September when the Foreign Secretary said on the Floor of the House:

"international treaties take primacy over national laws".—[Official Report, 16 September 2003; Vol. 410, c. 794.]

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and I refuted that. We tabled a series of questions, which ran into 2004, and forced the Government to back down. Our exchange eventually led to this answer:

"The ultimate guarantee of Parliamentary sovereignty lies in the power of Parliament to repeal all or any of the Acts which give effect to the EU treaties in this country. It is within Parliament's power to legislate contrary to the UK's treaty obligations. This of course includes legislation that might impact on the effective implementation of article I-10(1)" of the proposed constitution. It continues:

"The result of so doing, however, would be to place the UK in breach of its treaty obligations."—[Official Report, 15 December 2003; Vol. 415, c. 732W.]

It is always right to set out the case as fairly as possible and that is the Government's stated position as of January. I am prepared to say emphatically that that was not their view a few months before, but it is now on the record. If there are treaty obligations, which, of course, are made by prerogative, that are out of date or contrary to our national interests—as is so much European legislation, including the proposed European constitution, if it were to be enacted, and the common fisheries policy—they should be amended or repealed if the other member states and the European Commission will not renegotiate them.

I have always argued that if we are to be responsible in dealing with legislation that this Parliament would not want to continue to accept, we must first engage in the process of presenting our arguments to the other side—to those whom we oppose. After that, if they will not listen, we must steer our own course, as I put it in my personal message to my electors in the last general election. After all, every European treaty since 1972 has been a renegotiation, but only in one direction: further integration. European prerogative treaties—treaties that are made—would be swallowed up by the constitution which, when enacted, would prevail greatly to our disadvantage.

Having retreated in the face of our barrage, the Government will no doubt claim that, in view of their now stated position, my Bill is not necessary. That is not so. The reality is that we are facing the 21st century version of the bloodless revolution of the 1690s, except that the substitution of the Stuarts by the Hanoverians—merely one monarchy for another—was far less momentous in retrospect than the usurpation of our democratic Parliament by the European constitution. Democracy depends for its practical effect on delivery through effective accountability and fair and proper democratic procedures, not through waffle about abstract virtues.

Another important analogy is that the judges under the bloodless revolution were no longer appointed, as they had been previously under the Stuarts, at the King's pleasure—durante bene placito Regis. They were appointed so long as they behaved themselves—quamdiu se bene gesserit. Seeking to arrogate to themselves the making of laws at the expense of democratically elected representatives in Parliament would be beyond the pale, especially if that was accompanied by encouraging the judicial activism of the European Court, which is a new form of usurpation.

The forced abdication of James II was strictly unconstitutional and illegal. However, the absurd idea that it would have been possible for the Stuarts to return after they had been airbrushed out of the system was demonstrated by the failure of the Jacobite rebellions of 1715 and 1745. If we do not reassert the obligation of the UK courts to give effect to UK legislation subsequent to and in conflict with European laws, including the European constitution, we will face a similar fait accompli, but it would now be undemocratic.

Our parliamentary laws and the Westminster law-making system will be deemed to have been absorbed in practice, as events move forward, by the constitution and the assertions of the European cause. It will be an abdication by our Parliament if it whips through and enacts the European constitution without a referendum. The claims made by the European court in Costa v. ENEL, and a few other cases that I shall mention, for its own overruling jurisdiction would become reality. Such is the stuff of modern revolution.

Someone may have been listening to that whispering wind because the House of Lords European Union Select Committee report this month called on the Government to state their view on whether the European Court or national courts should be the final arbiter of the dividing line between UK and EU law, especially in the context of parliamentary sovereignty when there is conflict. That is what my Bill is all about, and I want Parliament to dig in its heels. I am not interested in the Government's weasel words because we have heard far too many of those on the subject during the past year or so.

The matter cannot be left to ambiguity. Present case law is clear. The judgment of Lord Denning in Macarthys Ltd. v. Smith and of Lord Justice Laws in the more recent metric martyr's case, Thoburn v. Sunderland city council, is clear. Let me take the opportunity to place on the record the sad tragedy that Mr. Thoburn died only a few days ago, ironically within a few days of the death of Sir William Wade, the great authority on the interaction of European law and the British parliamentary system.

Lord Denning stated in Macarthys Ltd. v. Smith:

"it would be the duty of our courts to follow the statute of our Parliament"

if

"the time should come when our Parliament deliberately passes an Act with the intention of repudiating the Treaty"— that is, the European treaty—

"or any provision in it or intentionally of acting inconsistently with it and says so in express terms".

We must keep the courts to that in the light of the European constitution, and the wording in my Bill follows almost exactly the words of Lord Denning in that judgment.

I have set out what my Bill does. There is no time and no scope for uncertainty or ambiguity, or for allowing the Government or the European elite room to manoeuvre. The Bill is backed by many distinguished Conservative MPs and Privy Councillors, and by hon. Members on both sides of the House—

Mr. Cash: The matter is of vital national interest and I trust that I shall have the support of the Conservative leadership and a commitment to my proposals in the manifesto for the European elections and the next general election. The claims made by the European Court in Costa v. ENEL and the Internationale Handelgesellschaft and other cases, and the related line of European Court cases in relation to what is called Kompetenz-Kompetenz, cannot be underestimated, as the Foreign Secretary sought to do, especially in the light of article I-10(1) of the proposed constitution. The constitutional courts of Germany, Denmark and Italy are all in defiance, but look as if they may be about to roll over. The legal adviser to the European Council and others said:

"The EU is not a federal state for lack of demos, lack of Kompetenz-Kompetenz and more simply for lack of will by its constituent parts."

That suggests a lack of will by member states. One has only to look at the outpourings of the European People's party and the Christian Democrats in Germany, not to mention a host of others, to observe that that is not correct. Furthermore, the simple reality is that the ever-pervasive and encroaching—

Mr. Cash: Furthermore, there is a simple reality: the ever-pervasive and encroaching role of the European Court of Justice, now to be enhanced by the European constitution. It is a case of "Now you see it, now you don't". It is a world of magical mirrors, engulfed in smoke. It is disingenuous and naïve—I would say downright dishonest—to suggest that EU constitutional boundaries have been reached.

We only have to consider the 1970 White Paper and the evolution of the EU over the past 35 years to get the point. We need to ensure that our courts, without a written constitution, do not stray in the wrong direction. If the Government were sincere in their declarations that they do not want a superstate, they would commit themselves to the proposals that I have outlined.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) on a magnificent speech and on his battle to preserve democracy in the European Union. It cheers up the people of Rochford and Southend, East enormously that he still feels positive about democracy, when their own MP has become such an absurd pessimist on the issue.

I ask the Minister one simple question. On 6 November 2002, a Minister of State at the Department for Work and Pensions told me that, following discussions with the European Commission, the Government were told that under regulation 1408/71, Britain would have to pay winter fuel payments to British residents in Martinique, Guadeloupe, French Guiana, Reunion, the Azores, Madeira and the Canary Islands, all of which are overseas territories of Europe. The cost would be £10 million. As a result of the Chancellor's Budget, it will now cost us £15 million.

As those are areas of sunshine with no coldness at all, my constituents want to know that if our Parliament thinks, as I do, that that is nuts, crazy and an abuse of funding, can British MPs vote to stop it? If the 659 MPs say that that is stupid, nuts, wrong and a waste of money, my constituents, especially the pensioners in Southend who suffer from the cold, want to know whether Parliament can stop it? Can we say that the people who live in Guadeloupe, Martinique and the Azores will not get winter fuel payments, and perhaps the people in Iceland or the north of Canada, where it is cold, will? If the Minister can give me an answer—perhaps not today, but by letter—that will reassure my constituents who feel that our democracy is almost dead and wonder why we have MPs at all.

4.47 pm

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Mike O'Brien): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) on securing the debate. The hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor) will be pleased to know that the new European constitution, if adopted, would give greater power to the British Parliament to deal with such issues, so I am sure that he will vote for it.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Would it have the power to stop that payment?

Mr. O'Brien: I had not given way, but I had made my point. I will happily write to the hon. Gentleman on the detail.

As for the main debate, the hon. Member for Stone argues that the draft constitutional treaty for the EU will undermine the sovereignty of this House. He could not be more wrong. Nothing in the new treaty, as drafted, would alter the fundamental relationship between this country and the European Union. The new treaty will strengthen the role of national Parliaments in EU business, which is why I can say what I said to the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East. The new treaty will strengthen that role.

The treaty will, for the first time, give this Parliament a power, at the EU level, to monitor and enforce subsidiarity. This House, and other national Parliaments, will be able to force the Commission to reconsider measures that do not meet the fundamental principle that decisions should be taken as close as possible to Europe's citizens.

The suggestion made today by the Leader of the Opposition that the draft treaty is the capstone of a federal state is sheer opportunistic hyperbole and soundbite claptrap. There will be a significant enhancement of the role of this House in European affairs under the provisions, if they are agreed. That reflects the Government's belief in the integral part that Parliament should play in debating and influencing the policies of this Government and of the EU. On 11 February, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary set out to the House various ways in which the Government propose to enhance that role of Parliament. They include the publication of an annual White Paper on the forthcoming plans of the Commission and of the European Council and giving sufficient notice of them to all Members of the Commons and the Lords so that they have an opportunity to influence policy before it is set in stone.

The opportunities for parliamentary involvement in the preparation and scrutiny of the draft treaty have been unprecedented. During the intergovernmental conference alone, Ministers attended eight Committee sittings—including three sittings of the new Standing Committee of the Intergovernmental Conference—that gave parliamentarians the chance to influence the negotiations. If this constitution is so important, it beats me why so few on the Conservative Front Bench—with the honourable exception of the hon. Member for Stone when he was on it—bother to turn up. We participated in more than a dozen debates on the same topic in this House and the other place last year, responded to 16 Committee reports and answered 60 parliamentary questions. That was in addition to the White Paper published in September, which set out the detail of our approach to the negotiations.

In May, 10 new member states will join the European Union, ending the cold war division of Europe and creating an enlarged single market of more than 450 million people: larger than the United States and Japan combined. There are huge advantages in that for Britain. However, if we want to maximise those advantages, we need to modernise the EU's structures to make it work effectively as a union of 25 countries. The new constitutional treaty will make the EU more effective and will give a clear definition of what the EU does and does not do. The constitution will not alter the fundamental constitutional relationship between the member states and the EU.

The hon. Gentleman claims that none the less the treaty will establish the principle of the primacy of European law and so end in some way the sovereignty of this Parliament. He claims that it will make the laws passed by this House and the other place in some way less relevant, or even redundant, as the EU will be able to override them. He believes that we should reject the principle of the primacy of EU law so that member states can effectively pick and choose which EU measures to adopt and implement.

Let us examine those claims. First, the principle of the primacy of EU law is, as the hon. Gentleman knows full well, well established. He should know because my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has been telling him that for a long time. The principle has been accepted since at least 1964, when the European Court of Justice ruled in the case of Costa v. ENEL that the law "stemming from the Treaty" cannot > "be overridden by domestic legal provisions ... The transfer by the states from their domestic legal systems to the Community legal system of the rights and obligations arising under the Treaty carries with it a permanent limitation of their sovereign rights against which a subsequent unilateral act incompatible with the concept of the Community cannot prevail."

That is what Britain signed up to when the Conservative Government of the day joined the then European Community. This House gave effect to the principle of the primacy of European Community law through the European Communities Act 1972. Is the Conservative party now opposed to that position, which it has supported for the past 30 years? Or is the hon. Gentleman out on his usual anti-euro limb? That remains to be seen.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Ind Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. O'Brien: The hon. Lady has not been present during the debate and she is aware that I have limited time, but I will be gracious and give way.

Ann Winterton: I am most grateful and I apologise for not having been here earlier. Is the Minister aware that the Minister for Europe in his Government has said in a written reply:

"The United Kingdom will honour its international treaty obligations until such time as Parliament decides to repeal the Acts that give effect to them."—[Official Report, 30 October 2003; Vol. 412, c. 360W.]

Is that not the opposite of what the hon. Gentleman has just been saying?

Mr. O'Brien: No, our position has been entirely clear, and we have held it throughout. Parliament already has the power to legislate contrary to our treaty obligations, but we should be in no doubt about what that would mean: withdrawal from the EU, which would be a disaster for the UK.

As far as we are concerned, the draft constitutional treaty explicitly states the principle of primacy, and that makes those on the Opposition Benches nervous. One of the purposes of the treaty is to lay out clearly EU principles and our relationship with the EU. The Conservative party signed up to those principles in 1972; it knew what it had signed up to. That is why we support a declaration proposed by the Italian presidency during the intergovernmental conference negotiations last December that spells out that "the provisions of Article 10-I (1)on the primacy of EU law reflect existing court of justice case law."

Mr. Cash: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. O'Brien: The hon. Gentleman has had his say; I have not got long, and I would like to make some progress.

We support that proposal for clarity because if EU law did not have primacy, there would be no single market. If member states could pick and choose which European legislation they enforced, they would ignore legislation that threatened the protectionist measures that give special privilege to their industries, and we would not have the level playing field on which thousands of British businesses and hundreds of thousands of British jobs depend.

The reality is that co-operation with our European partners on everything from the single market to stopping pollution to fighting terrorism depends on each member state implementing the measure that it has agreed to. To argue against this part of the treaty, as the hon. Gentleman is doing, is to argue against the very idea of European co-operation. Here, perhaps, we get to his real agenda. His pamphlet of October last year entitled "The European Constitution—A Political Timebomb" advocates a two-tier Europe where the UK has a relationship of trade and association with the EU. It is a scenario in which the UK would be forced to implement EU legislation if it wanted to continue to trade with Europe, but in which the Government and Parliament would have no influence on that legislation. How the hon. Gentleman could see that as a blow for parliamentary sovereignty escapes me.

The primacy of EU law is a well-established principle that has sat alongside the principle of sovereignty of this Parliament for 30 years. Nothing in the proposed treaty will change that. Most lawyers will be familiar—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is—with Lord Denning's view expressed in his judgment in the Bulmer v. Bollinger case in 1974. He said:

"When we come to matters with a European element, the Treaty is like an incoming tide. It flows into the estuaries and up the rivers. It cannot be held back. Parliament has decreed that the Treaty is henceforward to be part of our law . . . The governing provision is section 2 (1) of the European Communities Act 1972 . . . The statue is expressed in forthright terms which are absolute and all-embracing."

In other words, the Conservatives signed up to this in 1972. Their attempt somehow to disassociate themselves from the principle 30 years later is frankly opportunistic hogwash.

In order to give the provisions of the new treaty effect in UK law, they will have to be passed by Parliament. If Parliament so chooses, it can refuse to pass this legislation. Indeed, it could repeal the European Communities Act 1972. As Lord Denning also said in the case of Macarthys Ltd v. Smith, it is always within Parliament's power to legislate contrary to the UK's treaty obligations, but we must be clear that to pursue that course would be to breach our treaty obligations, and we would be signalling our withdrawal from the EU.

It being one minute to Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

China

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Paul Clark.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): I am pleased that we are having a debate on the subject of our relations with China in Government time in this Chamber. I understand that this is the first time in two years that we have had such an opportunity. There is a series of reasons for that, and they will become clear during the debate, which is exceedingly timely.

I pay tribute to the all-party China group led by my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman), who, I know, will take part in the debate, as will many other members of that group. It does exceedingly good work in building, at the parliamentary level, important links between the United Kingdom and China.

It goes without saying that China is an important world player and a fellow Security Council member. Bluntly, it is a country that we have to engage with. Whether the issue is climate change, economic prosperity and development or world security, if we are not engaging with China, we are seriously missing out. We have important interests to pursue, including promoting regional security, helping China to reform its economy and reduce poverty and fulfilling our obligations to the people of Hong Kong.

I am pleased to be able to say that the state of our relationship is good. Reflecting China's increasing economic weight and political influence, we are working to step up that engagement across the board. Building a strategic relationship with China is, I believe, key to our international interests. That is reflected in the four main themes of our Whitehall China strategy, which was agreed by Ministers and endorsed by the Prime Minister in June 2002. They are: first, encouraging greater Chinese engagement in international issues; secondly, supporting greater Chinese integration into the world economy—something that is both inevitable and important; thirdly, pushing forward the process of political and economic reform in China; and fourthly, promoting Britain as a partner for China.

This is a good opportunity to reflect on what has changed in China since we last had an opportunity to debate the subject. The new leadership that has been established there, led by President Hu Jintao, who visited the UK before his election, has made it clear that it will continue the policy priorities of economic growth, internal stability and steady opening up to the world. All of those are positive trends and developments.

We have seen the success of that, particularly with the Chinese Government's reaction to the severe acute respiratory syndrome crisis. After initial hesitancy, the Chinese Government rose to the challenge and co-operated with the World Health Organisation. I know that a number of Members agree with that view. Senior officials were sacked for non-co-operation and for covering up cases. The lessons that the Chinese learned during the SARS crisis have been put to good use during the more recent avian flu epidemic. China undoubtedly now has a more open approach to informing the public of public health crises and the measures that are being taken to address them. That is a particularly positive development.

The extent to which a one-party state can meet and embrace the challenges of a free-market economy is a recurring question that I have discussed with a number of Members in the Chamber, and with that in mind I followed the debate at China's recent National People's Congress with great interest. Three of the 13 changes to the constitution strike me as particularly significant. Those are, first, the enhanced recognition of the important role of the private sector, secondly, the strengthening and protection of private property rights and, thirdly—significantly—the amendment to safeguard and respect human rights. We will want to reflect on those changes during the debate.

To me, those seem to be positive examples of the effects of rapid and sustained economic change on both the state and the individual in China. Continuing development will undoubtedly raise many issues for China's leadership, with far-reaching implications for Chinese society and knock-on effects throughout the world. As one of China's friends, we will be looking with interest at whether China is able to manage its economic development evenly across the board. It is worth noting that one of the strong policy directions of the new leadership has been its determination to consider the consequences of economic development and, particularly, the way that an urban-rural split and an east-west split can be dealt with at the macro-economic policy level.

China is playing an increasingly active role in international affairs. Like us, it plays a leading role in the UN Security Council as one of the permanent five and it supports the international war against terrorism.

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor) (Con): The Minister is going to detail the four priorities that he identified earlier. In the last five minutes, he mentioned human rights briefly, but can he tell me whether the Foreign Office thinks that human rights should be one of the priorities. If it does not think that they are sufficiently important, why not?

Mr. Rammell: Human rights are an important element of our relationship and I will comment in detail on our view of human rights in China.

China is a key player on the international stage. In particular, the decision that it took at the Madrid conference to pledge $24.2 million bilateral aid for Iraq was an exceedingly positive step. In addition, the way in which China has taken the initiative in setting up and promoting the six-party talks about handling the difficult challenge of North Korea's nuclear ambitions, which in many senses may be seen as a new trend and development in the way in which China engages in international affairs, has been extremely positive.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am pleased to hear my hon. Friend mention North Korea. I accept that China has played an interesting role in trying to change the North Korean regime. At the same time, to link to the previous intervention on human rights, we measure not only what the Chinese say but what they do. It would help if they did not send back North Korean émigrés who have sought refuge in China because of the persecution in North Korea. Will my hon. Friend say what the Government are doing to take that up with the Chinese Government?

Mr. Rammell: There is a significant concern about the human rights situation in North Korea. As I am the Foreign Office Minister responsible for the human rights portfolio, some of the most appalling allegations about human rights come across my desk on a daily basis, and those in the recent BBC documentary on human rights in North Korea were among those that have shocked me the most in the 16 months that I have been a Foreign Office Minister dealing with that brief. There are, therefore, concerns about genuine refugees fleeing North Korea in fear of their lives. We have engaged with the Chinese Government. Indeed, I did so earlier this week, urging them to consider carefully the refugee claims coming from citizens crossing the North Korean border and, particularly, to involve the UN High Commissioner for Refugees in assessing those claims. We have made that case and we will continue to do so.

Relations with China are also developing at the level of the European Union, and in September 2003, both the European Union and China produced policy papers on strategies to enhance that relationship.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): What will the attitude of the European Union be to a resolution proposed by the United States of America on human rights in Tibet at the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights? Many people are concerned that the EU has appeared to be at least ambivalent, if not disinterested, in human rights in Tibet.

Mr. Rammell: I shall comment later in greater detail about specific aspects of human rights policy, particularly, our stance on resolutions that are likely to be forthcoming from the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights. I assure the hon. Gentleman that if I do not specifically address his question at that stage, I will do so in the summing up.

As I am dealing with relations between the European Union and China, it is pertinent to take the opportunity to mention briefly the EU embargo on arms sales to China. The European Council agreed on 12 December to review the policy on the embargo, and the General Affairs and External Relations Council decided in January to remit the issue to a working group for detailed examination. Once that has happened, the matter will revert to the Council.

The subject is complex and needs careful consideration. We support the review and have encouraged our EU partners to conduct it rigorously and to take full account of the impact of lifting the embargo. We are still considering our position within that context, but I assure hon. Members that lifting the embargo would not remove our ability to control arms sales to China. Since the embargo was established, our own arms export criteria and code of conduct, and the EU code of conduct interpreted by the UK through the consolidated criteria, have been incorporated. Come what may, they will remain in place as a significant means of controlling exports to China.

I come now to the bilateral relationship, which has been stepped up vigorously in both directions by senior visits from many Ministers. Nine members of the present British Cabinet have visited China in the past year, and the Prime Minister visited last summer. We look forward to a visit by Premier Wen Jiabao later this year. There is a two-way exchange of ideas, discussion and information.

As an indication of the importance that the Prime Minister attaches to our links with China, after his visit last summer he charged the Deputy Prime Minister with leading a group to discuss with the Chinese authorities how to promote our relationship with China in new and dynamic ways. In preparation for the next meeting with the Chinese at prime ministerial level later this year, the task force is drawing up a list of innovative proposals for deepening the relationship. Initially, the task force is focusing on trade and investment, science and technology, education and the environment. It is an exceedingly important process.

We also have a significant trade relationship with China. UK trade with China has doubled in the past five years, growing faster than that of any of our G8 competitors. That shows that at government and business levels we are focusing on the opportunities that are available. The process is two-way, as approximately 150 companies from mainland China invest in the UK. China's accession to the World Trade Organisation in December 2001 has accelerated the opening up of its economy and improved the competitiveness of its industry. China is a priority market for UK Trade and Investment, and the UK is now the fourth largest EU exporter to China, behind only Germany, Italy and France. We want to build on that strong position. Many British companies are playing an active role in Beijing and in the development of China more generally.

It is worth commenting on the perceptions of the relationship between the two countries, particularly the perceptions that Chinese people have of this country. A recent Gallup poll highlighted the outdated perceptions of Britain among young educated Chinese people. We were concerned about those perceptions and rightly responded by mounting a major campaign to correct them and to project the UK as a partner of choice for China. As a result, the successful Think UK campaign took place throughout China from October 2002 through much of 2003 to promote the real face of Britain today. Its aim was to reach a young educated audience through the mass media and show them the creative and innovative sides of Britain and how they are relevant to China's aspirations and development needs. There has been enormous interest in the campaign, and on my visits I have been able to see some of the good initiatives that have resulted from it.

We also have significant relations with China through education. China is one of seven target countries identified in the Prime Minister's initiative to attract international students to this country. There has been a welcome and significant increase in the number of Chinese students studying in universities in the United Kingdom—currently about 35,000. It is a significant trend and development in virtually every university in the country.

Any debate about China would not be complete without reference to Hong Kong. It has a dynamic and positive part to play in our relationship with China. It is an integral part of the Pearl River Delta region, which is the fastest growing region of the fastest growing economy in the world. Many British companies continue to enter the Chinese market through Hong Kong. We should, and do, help them as much as we can with that process.

As we look forward politically and economically, we should not and we do not forget our responsibilities towards Hong Kong, emanating from the 1984 Sino-British joint declaration on Hong Kong. Given the importance of that, the Foreign Secretary reports to Parliament twice a year on the situation in Hong Kong. We are pleased that the handover went smoothly—to be blunt, better than many people had expected. It was a good example of Sino-British co-operation.

Some seven years on, our reports continue to assess that "one country, two systems" is generally working well in practice. We welcome the fact that the Chinese Government and the Hong Kong Special Administrative Regional Government have shown a commitment to making a success of "one country, two systems". The rule of law, an independent judiciary, a meritocratic civil service, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and the free flow of people and information are all rightly still intact.

It is worth noting that on a few occasions we have had particular concerns about certain developments in Hong Kong that might impact upon the workings of the joint declaration. On such occasions we have raised those concerns with the Special Administrative Regional Government or Beijing, as appropriate.

If necessary, we make those concerns public, and that is right. For example, as the Minister responsible I made five public statements during 2002–03 about the national security legislation that was mandated by article 23 of the Basic Law. I remember discussing that in the Foreign Affairs Committee with some of the Members present in the Chamber, because we shared the concerns of many in Hong Kong that the proposed legislation might undermine the rights and freedoms of the people of Hong Kong and lessen its autonomy from mainland China, as was properly provided for under the joint declaration and the Basic Law. We were very pleased that the Special Administrative Regional Government decided last year to withdraw the draft legislation and to consult the people of Hong Kong further. That has been welcomed within Hong Kong generally.

When examining Hong Kong, the current big political question is over constitutional reform. The Basic Law, Hong Kong's mini-constitution, to which we were not party, lays down the ultimate aims of selection of a Chief Executive and election of all members of the Legislative Council by universal suffrage. However, decisions must be made about the pace at which that happens. Inevitably, there are differences of opinion about it in Hong Kong, and recent press commentary has noted that. We are following the debate closely, and our views on the subject are clear and well known.

We hope that there will be early progress towards the Basic Law's ultimate aim of the selection of a Chief Executive and all members of the Legislative Council by universal suffrage at a pace in line with the wishes of the people of Hong Kong. As the Prime Minister made clear when he visited there last July, it is vital that Hong Kong continues its advance towards universal suffrage but maintains the stability that is the bedrock of its success. Given our historical responsibilities, we will continue to follow events closely.

Several Members have raised the subject of human rights in China. Although bilateral relations are good and we are looking to develop them, we have areas of disagreement with China. It is a sign of a healthy and developing relationship that we can engage in a critical dialogue with China on such issues. Human rights and individual freedoms, particularly on the economic and social side, have undoubtedly increased greatly in the past 10 years, but we are still concerned about the human rights situation.

In 1997, we decided that a policy of critical engagement was the best way to help China to improve its human rights. Our main tool in that engagement has been the bi-annual UK-China human rights dialogue, at which we raise hosts of issues, including individual cases of concern. The fundamental aim of that process is both important and worthwhile: to bring about sustained and long-term improvements in Chinese human rights by engaging the Chinese authorities in direct discussions on issues of concern. Nevertheless, it is not always understood that that dialogue does not stop us from speaking out about abuses in China, or from pressing for improvements, which we do both publicly and privately.

We acknowledge China's progress in improving the economic lot of its people, and it would be churlish not to acknowledge the encouraging progress in areas such as legal reform, but there is no doubt that much more is needed. We want to see progress in the treatment of religious activists, Falun Gong adherents and political dissidents, and regarding the death penalty and North Korean border-crossers. We remain particularly concerned about Xinjiang and Tibet.

There have been calls for the UK to support a resolution on China at the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights in Geneva this year. We are likely to vote in favour of such a resolution, and will certainly vote against a no-action motion. When I spoke at the commission, last week, I clarified our position on the human rights situation in China.

One of the most encouraging developments since we began our human rights dialogue is the increased willingness of the Chinese to engage with international mechanisms, which will ultimately lead to sustained improvements in human rights. That brings to a head the debate about standing on the sidelines and criticising rather than engaging with a country. Examples of progress in China include the ratification of the international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights, and the submission of the first report in May 2003; serious consultations with us and the EU about ratifying the international covenant on civil and political rights; and the creation of a Chinese working group to study ratification. We will certainly help in whatever way we can. Progress is also demonstrated by the good levels of co-operation between China and the

[Mr. Rammell]

Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights. They are all positive developments, which at least demonstrate an increased willingness on the part of the Chinese to engage with those issues.

Some people claim that we have allowed trade considerations to subvert our human rights concerns, but I, as a Minister at the centre of this issue, do not agree. Of course, it is important that we pursue trade links with China, but that does not, should not and will not stop us from speaking out on human rights concerns.

Mr. Drew: The Minister has not mentioned the policy of coercive population control and the fact that China continues to have a one-child policy, which involves forced abortion and sterilisation. Whatever one's view on the size of China's population, one cannot say that that is the behaviour of a developed country. What engagement do the British Government have on that most basic of human rights? Do they involve themselves with the way in which population is controlled?

Mr. Rammell: Any policy of forced abortion is wrong. We have discussed that subject, and I hope to comment further on that issue when I sum up.

I come now to illegal immigration, a subject that is of keen interest to both our countries. There is undoubtedly a growing Chinese community in the United Kingdom. It plays an increasing and welcome part in the life of this country, but we cannot, and should not, shut our eyes to the problem of illegal immigration. Illegal immigration and the associated trafficking are a problem for the UK and China. If anyone needed convincing of that, last month's events at Morecambe bay underlined the importance of ongoing co-operation between our two countries on illegal immigration.

We note with regret that China is a major source of illegal immigration into the UK and is one of the top five countries that produce asylum seekers. We are working with the Chinese Ministry of Public Security to stop would-be over-stayers and asylum seekers travelling to the UK, and to return to China those who succeed in reaching the UK. Our key objective in dealing with unjustified asylum claims is to increase the number of asylum seekers returned to China. We have asked China to post a permanent official to its embassy in London to assist in identifying failed Chinese asylum seekers, and we want to continue to work and co-operate with the Chinese authorities in this regard.

I shall comment briefly on the situation in Taiwan. The UK's position on Taiwan's status has not changed. We have no diplomatic ties with Taiwan, but we enjoy good bilateral relations in several areas such as trade, culture and education. Approximately 13,000 Taiwanese students are enrolled on courses of various lengths in the UK—an increase from only 300 about 10 years ago. Taiwanese investment in the UK has slowed from its peak in the late 1990s, but the UK is still the leading location for Taiwanese investment in Europe, which we welcome. That is significant.

We have also welcomed the continued development of democracy in Taiwan. In March 2000, we witnessed the first democratic transfer of political power in Taiwan. The fact that that transfer was smooth and peaceful shows once again Taiwan's impressive achievements in establishing a fully functioning democracy in recent years. I am sure that all Members will join me in applauding and welcoming that.

It was also good to see that more than 80 per cent. of the electorate voted in last Saturday's elections in Taiwan. Perhaps we could aspire to that in this country if we all got our act together. On Saturday, the central election commission announced provisionally that Chen Shui-bian had won. I understand that it will make a formal announcement tomorrow. I also understand that Opposition candidates have asked for a recount and a judicial review. Whatever happens, I hope that all parties will urge calm, and that the issue can be dealt with through the appropriate legal mechanisms.

I want to make it clear that we believe that Taiwan's future is a matter for people on both sides of the Taiwan straits to settle peacefully among themselves. We would be extremely concerned by any recourse to military action, and we take every suitable opportunity to convey to the Chinese Government and through informal channels to the Taiwanese that we strongly oppose the use of force.

Mr. Trend: I have a factual question for the Minister. Has a date been set for the visit of the Chinese Premier to London? I do not know if he has already mentioned that, as I was dozing.

Mr. Rammell: Plans are under way. I will check whether that visit has been publicly confirmed. If it has, I will let the hon. Gentleman know when I sum up.

In conclusion, this is an important opportunity to discuss our relations with one of the most significant countries in the world. I hope that as many Members as possible can contribute to the debate, and that we can have a really good discussion.

2.59 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): I thank the Minister for securing the debate and for giving us such a comprehensive overview of our relationship with China. I also pay tribute to the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman), who brings to the House a unique understanding of China. He has succeeded in building very strong links between parliamentarians in the United Kingdom and in China. I salute his efforts and all those who are associated with him.

I should like to apologise to the Minister, to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to other hon. Members for the fact that I may have to leave a little early for an unavoidable appointment outside the House, away from London.

It is good to speak on a subject that is highly important, about a country that assumes ever greater economic and geopolitical importance. This debate is also topical, given the recent Taiwanese elections and the apparent breakdown in the talks with North Korea, in which China has played such a constructive role. China enjoys a good relationship with the United Kingdom and that is to be welcomed. Indeed, the Conservative party, perhaps to the surprise of some, enjoys an enduringly strong relationship with China, which dates back to the premiership of Sir Edward Heath.

With its economic and political clout, China has the opportunity to become a major global force, a power that we would ignore at our peril and with which we must remain constructively engaged. Chinese civilisation and culture have of course contributed immeasurably to the world, just as the enterprise, value and work ethic of Chinese communities have enriched national life in the United Kingdom and in other countries throughout the world, with remarkable success. China is enjoying exceptionally high levels of economic growth and is still only beginning to realise its vast economic potential—a potential that is increasingly felt in the global economy. Although China took steps yesterday to cool the pace of loan growth and tighten monetary policy by announcing a series of interest and bank rate reforms, the boom continues.

China's foreign and domestic policies revolve round the key objective of economic growth, focusing on market liberalisation, privatisation and globalisation. China's recent economic growth has been impressive and consistent. She has a huge and growing appetite for raw materials to fuel that economic growth. Coupled with a harnessing of her vast supplies of human resources, the utilisation of communications advances and the undoubted political will to make things work, that should lead to continued advances and growth. Along with the US economy, her economic success has been a driving force for world economic growth.

In 2003, Chinese real GDP growth was estimated at 9.1 per cent. Production levels are rising year on year; for example, car production alone rose by 32.7 per cent. That is only one example, but it is symbolic of a pattern repeated across the Chinese economy. In 2002, China accounted for 4 per cent. of global GDP. She is currently the sixth largest economy in the world and is projected to be fourth largest by 2010. All that presents an impressive picture, which is complemented by China's participation in international trade. China's accession to the World Trade Organisation was welcome. Her membership will open up important new markets and act as an important encouragement to economic liberalisation. China had exports totalling a huge $438 billion in 2003 and imports of a similar range and quantity. China is a huge market, with tremendous potential for British, American and other firms. China's increased participation in the global trading system is to be welcomed, not feared.

Trade and economics are but one facet of China's complex and multifaceted geostrategic position, but they also have a direct impact upon China's domestic political development. One consequence of China's impressive economic growth, which I have seen for myself on a number of occasions, is a widening gap between rich and poor, between urban and rural communities, among regions and between the so-called elite and the mass of the population. Such differences as arise during a period of economic transition are perhaps inevitable, but they give rise to tensions and pressures in society for parallel political reform and social reform. Such pressures are evident in China. The challenge facing China's rulers is how best to address them and to ensure that all Chinese share in and benefit from economic success.

Under the leadership of Hu Jintao, small steps have been made towards greater participation in government at the village council level. It is progress, and is thus to be welcomed, but it is only a small step.

I believe that there can be no doubt that the Chinese Communist party remains determined to preserve its hold on power. Economic growth must be sustained, runs the strategic equation in China, so that continued improvements in living standards can be delivered, thereby reducing social inequality and possible discontent and preserving at the least an acceptance of the continual rule of the Communist party and the current system. Whether such a calculation will be capable of satisfying aspirations for greater participation and empowerment for any length of time remains doubtful. However, it is to be hoped that China will look towards more long-term reforms designed to increase democratic participation and diversity.

We can rightly be proud of our relationship with China, but it is also right that we are honest with our friends. As China's influence and participation in international affairs grows, we would encourage her Government to take seriously the many documented human rights concerns of which she is accused. The latest Foreign and Commonwealth Office human rights report makes our concerns in that respect clear, and the US has spoken out particularly forcefully against China's human rights record, leading China to bring talks with the US on the subject to an end. To simply lecture and hector would serve little purpose, but I hope that the Government will reaffirm their commitment to remain actively engaged with the Chinese Government on the issue and will make clear the tremendous advantages to China, and to their international image and reputation, of taking an increasingly open and transparent approach. I hope that under the outward-looking leadership of Hu Jintao such considerations will increasingly feature in official thought.

A similar approach applies to Tibet. It would be wrong for me to seek to over-simplify that complex issue. However, in essence, China should seek to respect Tibetan culture fully, and I hope that the Chinese leadership will seek to build a successful direct dialogue with the Dalai Lama, given his standing in the world at large.

Hong Kong has also been a cause of some tension of late, with calls for increased democracy for the Special Administrative Region. The handover of Hong Kong in 1997 and the "one country, two systems" compromise that was reached was rightly regarded as a success, preserving much that was economically and politically successful about Hong Kong in the past. The expiry of Chief Executive Tung Chee-hwa's term of office in 2007 has led to calls from men such as Martin Lee for fuller democracy by that time and for the right directly to elect their next leader. However, Beijing appears unwilling to countenance that, although talks have been under way between Hong Kong's Chief Secretary and the Chinese Government in Beijing about the matter.

It is important—the Minister has alluded to this— for China to think seriously about the democratic aspiration that has been constitutionally incorporated in Hong Kong, and to continue the special status and feel of Hong Kong. It is a great tribute to the flexibility of the Chinese system that the handover has happened so successfully. China can be complimented on the way in which it has handled Hong Kong since the handover from the United Kingdom.

[Mr. Richard Spring]

The vexed question of Taiwan remains—one of the longest lasting and seemingly intractable disputes in the world. It is regrettable that the recent election results appear to be somewhat inconclusive and that Taiwan's voters appear split on the question of rapprochement with Beijing. We believe that a process of reconciliation can be carried out at all levels, even the most basic. Further useful and important steps could include the establishment of direct flights between Taipei and mainland China, for example, and improving communication and economic links in general. However, while encouraging such steps, it is right that we always bear in mind that Taiwan is now a functioning democracy. Its leaders must, in their own interest, approach relations with China in a way that minimises friction and maximises the potential for dialogue.

Of late, China has adopted a far more outward-looking approach internationally. She was a strong supporter of the fight against terrorism after 9/11 and has become increasingly engaged internationally through organisations such as the UN Security Council, the WTO and the Association of South East Asian Nations. Her increased participation in international multilateral diplomacy is encouraging.

I do not share the fear expressed by some that China's participation in international affairs is in some way threatening. Terrorism has proved a point of common concern between east and west, and China's overriding priority of economic growth means that she sees a stable international scene as important. China has no interest in raising the international temperature while economic growth remains its top priority. That is not to say that her self-image can be discounted, and she will doubtless react when she feels threatened or affronted. However, much of her current activity revolves round lowering the temperature in some parts of the world, including her relationships on the Indian subcontinent. More importantly, she is attempting to use her regional and global influence to address the threat posed by North Korea's nuclear activities, and Chinese diplomacy has been pivotal in getting talks under way. I look forward to a 21st century marked by increased co-operation and closer friendship with China and by the extension of current economic and political reforms. There can be no doubt that China will be a major global power in the 21st century.

A modern, well educated younger generation, many thousands of whose members are being educated in this country's universities, will undoubtedly want greater political plurality. China continues to debate reform and how to adapt to the changes wrought by economic liberalisation. That is no easy task, but the fact is that political liberalisation must go hand in hand with economic liberalisation. We can be confident that the reform process will grow and will, in time, deliver an increasingly successful, prosperous and internationally engaged China. That prospect is very much to be welcomed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): As hon. Members will know, this is a three-hour debate, but it might be helpful if I point out that we have already exhausted 42 minutes. If I choose to set aside 10 minutes for the winding-up speeches, we will be left with about 125 minutes. I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will take account of that when making their contributions and accepting or making interventions.

3.13 pm

Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): I shall try to be as brief as I can. However, it would be remiss of me not to thank the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) and the Minister for their kind remarks about the all-party group on China; I am delighted to see so many of its members and officers here today. It would also be remiss of me not to say how much I appreciate the fact that the Foreign Office has set aside time to debate this important issue. Members of the all-party group also appreciate the way in which the Minister has kept us, and parliamentarians generally, informed of Chinese matters.

There is always a juncture at which it is appropriate to debate China; indeed, such an occasion seems to recur regularly. This time, we are celebrating 50 years of our trading relationship with the People's Republic. As the Minister said, we also welcome the visit by the Chinese Premier.

Like the Minister, I wholeheartedly welcome the creation of the China taskforce chaired by the Deputy Prime Minister. That was important in itself, but the decision by the Chinese to reciprocate greatly enhances the initiative's potential as a tool for expanding existing spheres of co-operation. Like other members of the all-party group, I await with considerable interest the outcome of deliberations by both taskforces in the coming weeks.

I want to say a few words about the development of the group. It is a large group—one of the largest, I think, in the Palace of Westminster—and our membership has increased by 35 in the past two months alone. The main group now has 155 members, and its Hong Kong committee has, without duplication, 101 members, so we total 256. That makes us a significant group.

We recently received a delegation from our counterpart organisation in China to discuss ways in which we could deepen and strengthen our relationship with the UK-China friendship group in the Chinese Parliament. We have many things in mind. We want to make more regular visits, not necessarily in formal delegations, but as individuals or in small, specialist groups interested in science, technology and other areas. We want to exchange information on a regular basis, to engage in discussions and to make it possible for our members to take lessons in Mandarin.

We want to invite officials from the National People's Congress to London for training and experience, as we did on a former occasion. We may even want to invite members of the Congress individually for such training and experience. In any event, we need to deepen and widen the relationship between us as parliamentary bodies.

We need to visit China regularly because change is a constant there, and we need to keep up to date—and just to touch on a domestic matter, we need money for the purpose. I greatly appreciate the efforts that went into raising the money that comes to us through the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and I know that the Minister was instrumental in securing that, but it is important that we examine the funding of such bodies if they are to contribute positively to our bilateral relationship.

The all-party group's role is important. China's long-term aim is to move towards democratisation, and our role in that process and the development of parliamentary processes with the Chinese is surely valuable. Although we, as the mother of Parliaments, may have something to teach China, let us take account of the fact that it will have something to teach us. It is for that purpose that frank, frequent and robust dialogue at parliamentary level must continue and develop.

Times are changing, and the times when countries could maintain a state of isolation are long gone. Politically, China has more than come in from the cold. It has become a positive force in the international community, seized of the necessity of exploring the problems that unite us, rather than dwelling on those that divide. The new leadership has heralded what I hope will be a period of openness, as the Minister commented. The experience of SARS has brought about change.

We have differences on human rights. That is the issue that attracts most attention from members of the parliamentary group and their constituents. We frequently press our case to the Chinese parliamentary delegations and others, in a forceful manner. It is not a softball game. Human rights are a serious and pressing problem. However, we must be careful to acknowledge the staggering social, political and economic change that China has undergone in the past 30 years, and its overwhelming imperative of stability.

China is on a continuum that will, I believe, take it from economic reform through political reform to social and civil reform. Although that progress is not a straight line, it is our job to assist China, in however modest a way, along it. I share the Minister's enthusiasm for the decision of the National People's Congress to amend the constitution to broadcast the state's respect for and guarantee of human rights. What that will mean in practice remains to be seen.

The current state of social and political rights in China still leaves something to be desired. There is real progress to be made on the ground. Much has been said, and I shall not repeat it here, about the detention of democratic activists, the death penalty, Tibet and Xingjiang, and on the ineffectiveness of megaphone diplomacy.

China is an economic leader in its region not only because it is a massive economy with a massive internal market, but also because of its policies and its new internationalism. It was a bedrock during the last Asian financial crisis. It is now the driver of the regional and wider economy. Products from Japan and its neighbours have triggered growth in other areas of the world.

I was talking last night to a Brazilian diplomat who told me that the Brazilian economy had been sustained in recent times by the export of commodities to China. China is now one of the biggest consumers in the world of copper, tin and zinc; it is a big consumer of coal and rubber; and it is the world's largest consumer of cement. It is the world's second largest importer of oil—a growth in demand that has been instrumental in keeping up the price of oil. It is the factory of the world, accounting for half the world's cameras and photocopiers, a third of the world's air conditioners and a quarter of the world's refrigerators.

The Prime Minister spoke earlier of the Chinese speaking economic language with a fluency and comfort equal to that of any first-world nation. I agree with the Prime Minister and with the Chinese ambassador, Zha Peixin, who last week spoke of his expectation that Chinese and English would be the major languages of business in the years to come. Last year the economy grew by 8.5 per cent. in China, despite the SARS outbreak, and it attracted more direct foreign investment than the United States. It has developed a new, young, middle class, and in 2006 China will be obliged by the WTO to open its financial sector to foreign competition, with all the free, rapid contact with the world that that requires.

It has been said that China represents an economic bubble. The Minister said something about that, as did the hon. Member for West Suffolk, and I think others will too, so I will not. The consensus view seems to be that although reform will be increasingly difficult, growth rates above the mid-point will continue for some years to come.

We are, as the Minister said, facing a big trade deficit with China. I learned long ago, when I was involved in trade diplomacy, to argue the benefits of free trade when the trade balance was in our favour, and the benefits of reciprocity when it was in others. I am arguing for reciprocity in this case because we have a lot of expertise, services and goods that match Chinese needs. I compliment the work of the China-Britain Business Council, which has been the principal vehicle in the UK for the development of business in China; its work is to be encouraged, as is the networking and standing of the 48 Group club, which also plays a major part.

I should also mention the Great Britain-China Centre, which has unparalleled expertise in running exchange projects with Chinese partners working with many different UK organisations. It was chosen by the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights to be an implementing partner in human rights training for the Chinese police. The work of the Department for International Development is no less important, but the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) may say something about that so I shall leave it to one side. The British Council, as the Minister has said, is to be congratulated, not least in the context of Think UK. The council is instrumental in shaping the image of the UK abroad, and one look at the number of Chinese wishing to study here and experience British culture is testament to the remarkable job that it does in bringing perceptions of the UK up to date.

As China increasingly opens up to the global community, the links and understandings fostered at an early age among students through shared culture and experience can only contribute to a harmonious and empathetic future relationship. A truly successful relationship works both ways, of course, and although it is imperative that we do our utmost to encourage those in China to experience the finest that our education system has to offer, it is important that British students take advantage of the opportunities for study that exist in China. Astronomers at Liverpool John Moores university recently completed the manufacture of the world's largest robotic telescope, ordered by the Chinese Government to develop modern astronomical facilities in China. Nottingham university is to open a campus in Ningbo in partnership with the Chinese education authorities. That will be an exchange of research and expertise between academics and students in China and the UK. Liverpool's universities, which are close to my constituency, are closely engaged with these developments, as are universities across the UK.

I know that you wanted me to be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I would like to say a bit about Hong Kong. A major aspect of our bilateral relationship is quite properly apportioned to Hong Kong. Economically, the last couple of years have been stormy to say the least. The SARS virus impacted relatively severely and suddenly. However, growth has resumed and property prices have started to rise again.

I want to concentrate on democratisation. It may be thought that that is a matter for China, and not one on which external views should be expressed. However, Britain has a continuing interest in developments in Hong Kong and in the implementation of the joint declaration, so we have an interest in democratisation too.

Colleagues will be aware that the Special Administrative Region of Hong Kong is administered by a Chief Executive with the help of a Legislative Council and an Executive Council: LegCo and ExCo. The members of LegCo are elected on varying bases and by various constituencies. Under the Basic Law that has applied since 1997, provision is made for the gradual and orderly progress towards direct election, by universal suffrage, of the Chief Executive from 2007 and the LegCo members from 2008. Although the Chinese leadership is rightly concerned with protecting the stability of the giant nation with its varied, disparate and semi-autonomous regions, areas and provinces, it is also right that obligations vis-à-vis popular sovereignty in Hong Kong be honoured. That is not just a moral duty; it is a point of political and economic necessity.

To me, "legislative council" and "executive council" are terms that British administrators have traditionally used to describe legislatures in colonial territories. It may be just nomenclature, but to me a legislative council always seems to reflect a colonial concept. In any event, it is surely a form of government that is fundamentally transitory and has built-in obsolescence. It comes with and immediately after the plumed hats regime. Taken as a generic term, legislative councils have a tendency to be conservative bodies, for holding back rather than moving forward.

In Hong Kong, the concept of political appointees as so-called Ministers—the accountability system—seems to me equally transitory. The system seems to be wrongly described and is ultimately doomed to disappear if it has no Government party supporting it. A Government without a Government party lack credibility and strength. An Opposition without a Government party lack focus and cohesion. We need to move on to that sort of concept in Hong Kong.

If the "one nation, two systems" concept for Hong Kong is said to have been based on a template originally produced for Taiwan, how are the Taiwanese to view the matter if there is no progress towards normally understood forms of democratisation in Hong Kong? What the Basic Law does and does not allow may be a matter of debate, but the fact that more than 500,000 people marched in support of a democratic expression of views in Hong Kong suggests that progress on that has something of the imperative about it.

If the Hong Kong economy has improved, I would venture to suggest that that improvement lies in external factors, such as the strength of the Chinese economy and the number of tourists from the mainland coming to Hong Kong. It is not because of the strength of the Government. If, as I believe, Hong Kong will have to plan its strategy as it has not done before, it will require the strength of a Government backed by a Government party. The Chief Executive has announced a review and consultation, and I hope that that, and the work of non-governmental organisations such as the Civic Exchange, will lead to the earliest possible election by universal suffrage of the Chief Executive and the LegCo.

Finally, I want to say a few words about the Chinese community. The hon. Member for West Suffolk beat me to the draw, but it is worth saying that although in this country Chinese has been virtually synonymous with Cantonese, that is changing. What were known as Chinese restaurants in this country were Cantonese restaurants. However, the people who represent the Chinese community are now from all parts of China, as are the restaurants. The 2001 census enumerated 247,000 people of Chinese ethnic origin in the UK.

Large-scale migration of the Chinese to Britain is fairly recent. At the end of the second world war there were a few thousand Chinese in Britain. The majority of today's Chinese came in the 1950s and '60s largely from Hong Kong, attracted by opportunities in the catering industry in the UK. Although that is the general picture, it is not true in Liverpool, which is close to my constituency and has a community going back many years coming substantially from Shanghai. Later waves include Vietnamese and Chinese coming in the '70s and students from mainland China who have remained in Britain after finishing their courses.

The profile of the Chinese in Britain is one of a successful ethnic minority: small in size, young in age and balanced in gender, and its arrival is one of the most recent on the British scene. The Chinese are well educated: the proportion of those educated to college level and above surpasses that of the white population. They have a low unemployment rate and they are disproportionately represented in professional and skilled occupations. In education and occupation they have outperformed the rest of the populace and present a socio-economic profile reminiscent of the Chinese in the United States. In short, historically, they are an integrated and hard-working community.

Yet in 2001 the tabloid media made the Chinese scapegoats for the foot and mouth epidemic. Restaurants suffered a 40 per cent. drop in takings and racial attacks took place on Chinese in rural areas. In Northern Ireland it is estimated that as many as two out of three members of the Chinese community have been subject to racial abuse. That industrious and otherwise unobtrusive group has been the subject of distorted tabloid media presentation, painted sometimes as illegal immigrants, asylum seekers, long-term stayers, snakeheads, triads and God knows what else. The fact is that they are a highly contributory and a greatly respected part of the community. My friends from the community are currently in the House of Lords, President of the Manchester chamber of commerce, deputy lords lieutenant of their counties and so on. Because of their cultural, economic and family links with the PRC, they are not only a highly valued part of the community, but vital to our bilateral relationship.

China is a colossus of global, political, economic, social and cultural importance. In these times we should do all that we can to help to plot the future course of that great nation. It is our duty to assist it in its navigation and to keep its course smooth in so far as we can. We have much to offer China and it has much to offer us. There is much to hope for in years to come and our bilateral relationship still needs a lot of development, but I look forward to working with hon. Friends, the Minister, his colleagues in the Foreign Office, members of the all-party parliamentary group on China and our friends in the Chinese embassy to maximise the potential of our already strong bilateral relationship.

3.33 pm

Brian Cotter (Weston-super-Mare) (LD): I thank the Minister for initiating the debate, and the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman), who is the chairman of the all-party parliamentary group. It is a great pleasure for us to discuss China.

The importance of China is increasingly and rightly recognised for economic reasons and for the important role that it is playing in international diplomacy and affairs. It has suffered in the past from economic deprivation and can therefore bring an informed historical view to the world stage, which uniquely means that it has a leading role in representing third-world countries—something that is dear to my heart and to those of others in the Chamber. Although China is seen as a great power with an increasingly modern economy and a growth rate that many envy, it has that other role to play.

As a member of the all-party parliamentary group on China, I am fortunate to have many opportunities to meet members of the Chinese Government and the Chinese ambassador to this country. Through such contacts, we can learn from one another and open up various avenues. I spoke about the way in which China is a major player on the world stage and has the authority to represent an alternative view, such as that of third-world nations. At a recent meeting at the House, the ambassador legitimately spoke of the need for all peoples to be incorporated in the United Nations in a significant way that is based on regions, and the fact that many countries do not have the strength and power of this nation and, increasingly, of China.

The Liberal Democrats welcome the internationalist approach by which we engage with each other, talk to each other, learn from each other and respect each other. I am sure that many leaders in China will agree that there have been times when our relations have had an impenetrability that was based on circumstances and historical events. That is why our regular and open dialogue with our friends in China, between parliamentarians, our Governments, and increasingly our peoples, are so welcome.

There are great problems on the world scene—the growth of terrorist activity is a particular problem—and the fact that the Chinese Government have played a leading role in working with us to find ways of combating terrorism has been very welcome, since all Governments are potentially at risk. Korea is often mentioned whenever the all-party group meets officials. Korea is of great concern to us as well as to China, and I was interested to see that the South Korean Deputy Foreign Minister, Mr. Lee, is currently in China to discuss the nuclear stand-off and other issues in the area. At a recent meeting, the ambassador said how important relations with the EU were. He also pointed out that of all the EU nations, the UK is the leading investor in China.

It is important that we engage with China bilaterally and through the EU. It is therefore encouraging that Javier Solana, the EU foreign policy chief who visited China after the Madrid bombing, agreed with the Chinese Government that international co-operation was key to combating terrorism—a view with which Liberal Democrats, and, I am sure, many others, would also agree.

Before we conclude our debate on international affairs, I should say that we are all very concerned about the recent Taiwanese presidential election, to which the Minister referred in passing, the resulting uncertainty, and the continuing stalemate between China and Taiwan. We hope that the issue will be resolved, as there is clearly uncertainty about the direction in which the Taiwanese want to go. They may have voted for the status quo, but that remains to be seen. We hope that the improved economic relations between China and Taiwan will increasingly provide their own solution.

I spoke earlier about respect. As we in this world get to know one another better, we can listen to one another and learn from one another. I have the highest respect for the Chinese nation, with its long history and fascinating culture, which I have had the wonderful opportunity to experience first hand on my two visits to China, and in this country through the recent visits by Chinese opera and ballet companies.

I also pay tribute to the importance of China's medicine. Seven or eight years ago, I went to a Chinese medical practitioner when I was feeling very unwell. People will judge whether the results were any good. I must report that, as far as I am concerned, the results were reasonably good. We can learn from Chinese medicine and use our knowledge in the health service. Increasingly, the large pharmaceutical companies are looking to the Chinese experience.

On the subject of human rights, the Minister said that he was addressing several issues. The Liberal Democrat approach could be seen as interfering, and it is accepted that we do have a different historical perspective, but we are candid friends and should be able to speak as we find. I note that our Prime Minister recently spoke about our interest in an "ongoing dialogue with China over human rights issues", as he frequently has in the past.

On Tibet, the Prime Minister said that he welcomed the recent contact between Chinese authorities and the Dalai Lama. Recently, the Foreign Secretary spoke about EU-Chinese human rights dialogues, which I believe take place twice a year. We will always be interested in those issues, and look to the Minister to continue to address them on our behalf.

Let me make some general points on economic matters, in which I have a particular interest because of my portfolio in the House. Clearly, with China's economy growing at a rate of 8 to 9 per cent., there are tremendous opportunities for the UK. One area of growth is consumer products. We spend an enormous amount on consumer goods such as DIY products to beautify or improve our homes. I could go on at length about the economic progress that we could make in China, but I shall highlight only a few areas of growth in the Chinese economy about which we should be aware.

The hon. Member for Wirral, South spoke about learning Chinese. I tried to learn Mandarin but failed abysmally. I know a bit of French, but my pronunciation is not good. I have no doubt that some hon. Members will be able to pronounce the name of the company Carrefour better than I can. I note that that French retailing giant has just opened its 43rd store in China. I hope that our foremost groups—Marks and Spencer is one among many—take note of that. There is a fantastic market in China, and I hope that we do not allow the French to get ahead of us in it.

In China, 10 million new computers are sold every year. I realise that the market is highly competitive, but I hope that our IT companies make gains there. This country can establish a niche market, as we have a great deal of expertise in innovative software. Progress could be made in that area.

In studying the media in China, I note that there is more than one television organisation but that CCTV—China Central Television—has a significant presence. There are two aspects to using the media to get over our message. The Minister can use the news reports of television companies such as that one to explain what Britain stands for—they are a tremendous resource. Some fantastic television programmes are made in this country, many of which could perhaps be sold to China. Publicity is important.

There are many types of businesses—banking, financial services, manufacturing—through which we can co-operate in many ways. Car ownership among the Chinese public is increasing greatly. There are problems in exporting cars, but there are many related products. I hope that the Minister will continue to ensure that British companies become acquainted with the opportunities in China. I know that he will do that, because I have engaged in several conversations with him on the matter.

The all-party group has frequently been told by the ambassador and others about the many Chinese students—currently 60,000—who come to this country. That is an important initiative. The Minister may or may not recall that I have made the point before that we should engage with students who come to this country from China as much as possible and give them opportunities to meet our people. The all-party group cannot do much, but I hope that the Government will support universities—I am not sure about funding—in encouraging local communities to meet the students and vice versa. Education is vital for everything in life, not least in understanding one another's countries. It is encouraging to learn that our universities propose to have campuses in China. When I was last in China I managed to twin three schools from my constituency with three schools in Beijing. That is part of the process of trying to relate to one another more closely.

We could talk endlessly about China, but I shall not. With these few words about our relationship, open dialogue, the economy, education and opening up relations with the Chinese people as well as with the Chinese Government, I end by saying again how welcome this debate is. It is a step in the right direction of building understanding in this country about what China represents for us and for the world. I congratulate the Minister and the chairman of the all-party group on China on promoting this debate.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. By my calculations we have about 93 minutes available and there appear to be seven hon. Members seeking to catch my eye. I offer that as a gentle reminder.

3.46 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I reiterate the expressions of appreciation that other hon. Members have made to the Minister and to the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman). From the point of view of balance, I should like to make it well understood that not only does the all-party group on China do good work, but so do the all-party groups on Tibet, of which I have the honour of being chairman, and on Taiwan. We must keep our debate on China in that wider perspective. That I undertake briefly to do.

We are all pleased about the prospect of a visit to the United Kingdom by the Chinese Premier, Wen Jiabao. I gather that that is likely to take place in early May, although the Minister has promised us clarification. When Wen Jiabao comes, I am sure that he will understand that the British people have warm sentiments towards the People's Republic of China. The Government understandably regard China as a strategic force in the world and a power with which they must engage constructively. British business understands clearly the potential in the Chinese market. At the same time, the British people, who are lovers of democracy and freedom, are profoundly concerned by the lack of progress on human rights in the People's Republic. The failure, as yet, to embrace true multi-party democracy, the suppression of religion, and judicial practices that leave much to be desired all rightly cause anxiety. I hope that Her Majesty's Government can raise those anxieties face to face with the Chinese Premier when he arrives. It is quite appropriate that, as friends, we should be candid and not allow that opportunity to pass us by.

Mr. Drew: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised the issue of religious freedom, because, as a committed Christian, I am interested in the rise of the Christian Church in China. The Chinese Government have done everything that they can to forestall that advance, including putting many people in prison and restricting the development of the Church. Is that not something that the British Government should take up formally?

Mr. Wilkinson: Indeed. The hon. Gentleman puts the matter eloquently. As people of a democracy, we believe in the right of people to exercise their religious faith, whatever it may be. We are also adamant that the people of Tibet are perfectly entitled to express their religious faith in the Buddhist tradition and that, for example, the Falun Gong movement should be permitted in the PRC. We hold such fundamental freedoms dear, not only in this country but in Europe as a whole.

We also look forward most earnestly to the visit by His Holiness the Dalai Lama from 27 May to 3 June. On a day when the Prime Minister is due to meet Colonel Gaddafi, it is sad to reflect that there seems to be no time in his schedule to meet the Dalai Lama. Colonel Gaddafi's background is one of violence, but he appears to be eschewing a violent path, for which we are all most grateful. The Dalai Lama has resolutely and consistently pursued the path of peace since he had to leave his homeland.

This year sees the 45th anniversary of the brutal suppression of moves by the people of Tibet towards self-determination and freedom from the PRC. It is noteworthy that His Holiness has consistently pursued the path of peace, even despite that atrocity, which caused a mass emigration from Tibet into northern India and elsewhere. We are supposed to have an ethical foreign policy, and we should warmly welcome a leader such as the Dalai Lama at a time when international terrorism and the pursuit of political objectives by violent means are all too prevalent. I hope that Her Majesty's Ministers, if not the Prime Minister, will give him that warm welcome.

I should make another point about the use of peaceful as against violent means. The PRC is now a formidable economic power, which is growing at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum and sucking in vast amounts of overseas capital. It is perhaps keeping the value of its currency artificially low by means of the link to the dollar, and it can therefore flood world markets with cheap goods, building itself an ever stronger position. We would like that determination to pursue growth and prosperity to be focused entirely domestically, on ameliorating living standards, rather than on the acquisition of armaments.

I cannot, therefore, comprehend why the European Union, at the behest of the Federal Republic of Germany and the French Republic, in particular, should be reviewing arms sales to the PRC. In July last year, the annual report to the United States Congress on the PRC's military power made some interesting observations. It claimed that China had more short-range ballistic missiles—about 450—than previously thought and that it was expected to increase the number by more than 75 per year for an unspecified period. The estimated annual rate of accumulation was previously thought to be about 50 missiles per year. The sophistication and accuracy of Chinese missiles has improved, with the People's Liberation Army developing longer range models of the CSS-6 with ranges of up to 3,000 km, and therefore capable of reaching Okinawa.

The PRC is growing and sucking in foreign capital. As a result of its export drive, it is able to claim an ever bigger share of world markets. At the same time, however, it is pursuing a policy of modernising its armed forces. Although it is somewhat reducing manpower, it is also increasing the sophistication of its offensive capabilities. That comes at a time when its relationship with Taiwan is not easy. Taiwan is, as we see from its latest elections, an entirely democratic political entity. It has no aspirations to flex military muscles; it wants only to have a good relationship with its Chinese friends on the mainland and to allow its people to express their view of how their political destiny should be settled.

It is important to have a balanced policy on China and to seek every opportunity to maximise our trade without relinquishing our principled stand on human rights, and without diminishing our commitment to an arms sales policy whereby we sell armaments only to those countries that do not oppress their own people or pursue policies at home that violate human rights.

I ask the Government to use this and any other opportunity that arises to persuade the Government of the PRC to exercise clemency for Tenzin Deleg Rinpoche, who on 7 April 2004 will face the second anniversary of his arrest. You will remember, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that he was sentenced to death, with a two-year suspension, for allegedly plotting to split the country and cause explosions. His case was raised most recently by the European Union on 4 February 2004 when Chinese officials claimed that he was in good health. We were pleased to hear that, but we were anxious because the two-year suspension of his death sentence dates from his conviction in December 2002. I hope that the authorities of the People's Republic will, as evidence of their good will and preparedness to receive representations on human rights and humanitarian issues, exercise clemency and receive any further envoys from His Holiness the Dalai Lama. It has received two delegations from members of the Dalai Lama's Cabinet in north India, which is all to the good, but we want the process of engagement and dialogue to intensify. That is our hope and I am sure that the Government will take every opportunity to intensify that dialogue.

3.57 pm

Mr. Greg Pope (Hyndburn) (Lab): I am grateful to be able to make a brief contribution to what has so far been a wide-ranging and consensual debate. I want to speak on a narrow issue concerning human rights in China. In doing so, I pay tribute to the Minister, who is responsible for human rights more generally. I have served on the Foreign Affairs Committee and seen the Minister talking about human rights before the Committee, and it is refreshing to see a Minister so on top of his brief and taking the matter so seriously.

I associate myself with the comments of the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) about the Prime Minister finding time in his busy schedule to meet His Holiness the Dalai Lama at the end of May. That is incredibly important, and I hope that the Minister will convey the fact that hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber feel strongly about it.

The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood said that it is important to find a balance, and that is right. I agree with much of what has been said. China is, of course, an important partner on the Security Council of the United Nations and is a growing economic partner. I associate myself with the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) about the positive contribution made by the Chinese community in this country. In passing, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend: hon. Members on both sides of the House recognise his fantastic contribution to Britain's relations with China.

I am not sure whether we have the balance right on how we engage with the People's Republic of China on human rights. The country is a serial abuser of human rights; for example, it carries out more judicial executions not only than any other nation, but than all other nations combined—about 6,000 last year. The Government control access to all forms of media. Although we would all welcome the fact that internet access appears to be growing in China, there has been a worrying crackdown on so-called cyber-dissidents. There is widespread concern at the situation in the Xingjiang region, where secessionists have been labelled as terrorists. That is part of a wider concern: countries such as the PRC—Russia springs to mind—are hiding under the cloak of joining the war on terror, using it as an excuse to oppress their own people who do not agree with the views of the Government.

It is reasonable to ask: are we doing enough in Britain to promote political and religious freedom in China? Looking at Tibet as an example, it seems to me that political activists are routinely harassed, arrested and imprisoned. I want to briefly raise the issue of one person—it may seem unfair to single out one person in a country that is so populous, but it is important because this is a symbolic case.

Jampel Changchub, a monk who lived in the Drepung monastery near Lhasa, was arrested 15 years ago and charged with participating in counter-revolutionary organisations, spreading counter-revolutionary propaganda and undermining national security. Along with other monks from that monastery, he was sentenced to 19 years' imprisonment in the notorious Drapchi prison in Lhasa. Some of the time that he has served there was in an isolation unit, where there was not really enough room to lie down and he was kept in total darkness. The fact is that he has committed no crime in the eyes of the international community. He attempted to exercise a basic, fundamental human right to freedom of speech and freedom of association, the kind of rights that we take for granted—not only in this Chamber but in this country—as an everyday matter of fact. I understand that the Minister will be constrained by the diplomatic niceties, but I hope that he will consider joining me in calling for Mr. Changchub's unconditional release. If I write to the Minister, perhaps he will consider raising the case in the next round of the human rights dialogue.

It is against such a backdrop of human rights abuses that the Government of France—who else would think that it was a good idea?—proposed lifting the EU arms embargo in January. It is worth bearing it in mind that the arms embargo was put in place by the EU after the Tiananmen square massacre 15 years ago. The Minister was asked in a parliamentary question on 12 February whether he would oppose the lifting of the arms embargo. Given the catalogue of human rights abuses that we know about, I would not have thought that it was too hard to acquiesce to that request. Amnesty International says that China is engaged in a violent crackdown on cyber-dissidents and on the separatist movement in Xingjiang. It is engaged in the systematic use of torture, including beatings, electric shock torture, sleep and food deprivation, and the fairly routine execution of political prisoners. It is also involved in the repression of political and religious freedoms in Tibet.

Despite that, the Minister's answer to the parliamentary question about the lifting of the arms embargo was:

> "We welcome the review and are currently considering the UK's position."—[Official Report, 12 February 2004; Vol. 417, c. 1653W.]

I started off by saying that I admire the Minister and that he is doing a good job, but I have to say that that response—I shall make my wording diplomatic—is disappointing, to say the least. I hope that the Minister will assure the Chamber today that the British Government will oppose the lifting of the EU arms embargo.

I have raised my final question with the Minister before in a different setting. Is the human rights dialogue worth while? I know that he could point out the countries with which we have no dialogue, and that would be fair. North Korea comes to mind; we are not making any impact there, and the situation is terrible and may be getting worse. The Minister could also say in his defence, as he has done before, that non-governmental organisations support the continuation of the dialogue. That is also a fair point, but it is reasonable for me to point out that their support for it is not unconditional. Human Rights Watch has said that it is concerned—and I share that concern—that the dialogue has become a formality; it is not a genuine dialogue at all. Human Rights Watch wants benchmarking, monitoring of progress and, crucially, an exit strategy if the dialogue does not show tangible benefits.

The fact is that we have no benchmarking, we seem to have no monitoring, and we do not even appear to have an exit strategy. The Foreign Office human rights report, which I commend, and consider an extremely worthwhile document, contains a section on the People's Republic of China listing 11 UK Government objectives to encourage human rights improvements there. The truth is that for all our best efforts and warm words, we are not making a great deal of progress on any of them. I shall pick two examples. One of the objectives is a reduction in the use of the death penalty in judicial cases. I have already mentioned that the figure for last year was 6,000. Another British objective is obtaining a full response to cases of concern. The Government of the PRC did not even respond to 28 of the 44 cases of concern that were raised. It was not just that the response was inadequate—there was no response. It may be time for a rethink.

My last plea to the Minister is that if we are to conduct reviews, we should not review the EU arms embargo. Let us keep that. What needs reviewing is whether our human rights dialogue with China is paying dividends. I suggest that it is not paying as many as we would have hoped, and that the Government should think again.

4.7 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): I am sure that there are human rights concerns, but before the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope) turns them into black and white issues, I suggest that he goes to the Library and gets out an excellent book called "Just Law" that has recently been published by Baroness Kennedy of the Shaws. He might like to reflect on the incursions into human rights that are occurring in this country; they are serious matters. For example, we have seen the first occasion of ouster of judicial review, for certain cases, since Magna Carta.

I suggest that matters are not quite as black and white as certain hon. Members would suggest. I commend Helena Kennedy's book to the Minister. It is a good book, and an interesting read. However, that is not really what I wanted to say. I have four brief points to make.

We must do much more, including more to engage positively with China. I am fortunate to be one of the vice-chairmen of the all-party group that is led by the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman). He does an excellent job. As he said, we recently had a visit from the National People's Congress. It was a constructive visit and enabled Members to discuss just such issues as the hon. Member for Hyndburn has raised—Tibet, human rights and others. It was a considerable effort to get that meeting established.

This week, in the all-party Whip, the opportunity is advertised for hon. Members to go to the United States as part of the all-party group on America. That is an excellent all-party group. Last year I was fortunate to go to Washington as a member of the group. The delegation was led by a Cabinet Minister, supported by the then shadow Chancellor, who is now Leader of the Opposition. We met many members of the Congress and the Senate. That group has been funded by the Foreign Office for decades.

If we are to engage more meaningfully with China and members of the National People's Congress, we in the House must be consistent in that dialogue. We cannot just dip in and dip out, and have a dialogue one year, then pass on it for a couple of years. Given China's increasing importance in the world, I suggest to the Minister that, if we are to be serious about our dialogue with China, the House needs to improve the contact that we have with members of the National People's Congress.

That will require the Foreign Office to make some financial commitment to the all-party China group. Of course we can—and do—get a certain amount of money through sponsorship from the business community. However, I think that it sets an unhappy precedent if all-party groups in the House, particularly all-party country-related groups, have to rely increasingly on sponsorship from the business community to enable us to carry out our work effectively. The funding is not necessarily for Members to go to China, it is so that we can welcome members of the National People's Congress here and return to them the hospitality that they have given to us.

The Minister mentioned that there were concerns in China about the perceptions of the UK that were held there. I think that we can also be concerned about the perceptions in the UK of China. I conducted a survey a while ago. No school in the state system teaches Mandarin. Fifty schools in the private sector teach it up to GCSE. Level. My daughter was fortunate enough to be able to learn Mandarin up to GCSE level and she is now in Beijing teaching English. I was impressed that the first thing that she did was to acquire a Chinese mobile telephone. That generation cannot seem to live without a mobile telephone clasped to their ear. If we are to engage, develop and thicken a relationship with China, we need to examine how to promote and improve—really, to start—the teaching of Mandarin in this country. We cannot expect to understand Chinese people and their culture if we are entirely dependent on them speaking English.

Likewise, I suggest that we need to do much more with trade partners and to support the China-Britain Business Council in helping UK companies prepare for the Chinese markets. Sometimes there is a perception that, simply because the Chinese market is huge, a few of us should go there on a plane and find customers. The Economist had an interesting survey on China a couple of weeks ago, where it flagged up the considerable difficulties that can face companies. Foreigners tend to underestimate the eccentric nature of China's business environment. Perhaps it is not so much eccentric as different. I am fortunate enough to be invited to meetings of the 48 Group club, which gives awards for the exporter of the year to China. When I talk to the members, I am very often struck by the fact that it is a matter of luck that they happen to have found an appropriate niche. If we are to take advantage of the Chinese market and build up Chinese trading partnerships, I suspect that an enormous amount more needs to be done to prepare small and medium-sized companies in this country for the opportunities and the difficulties in China.

In other words, we need engage a lot more as parliamentarians, in our schools in learning more about Chinese culture and language and in business and regional business forums, such as the larger chambers of commerce, in trying to understand what makes China tick. I think that we need to up our game in those areas.

Finally, as Chair of the Select Committee on International Development, I would not wish to make a contribution without paying tribute to DFID for the work that it is doing in China. I know that many other Members want to speak in this debate, so I will not spell this out in detail, but it is important to remember that about a quarter of China's rural population live on less than $1 per day. They constitute about 20 per cent. of the world's total poor.

If we are to meet the millennium development goals, we and China must work in partnership to ensure that poverty in China is alleviated, as in other parts of the world. China is actually making significant strides with that, but it is important work and it would be remiss if tribute were not paid to DFID officials for the work that they are doing in poverty reduction and tackling HIV/AIDS. It is estimated that about 12 million Chinese will have HIV/AIDS by 2020, so it is a significant problem.

I say to the Minister: great debate, fantastic that it is in Government time, but where is the chequebook? The treasurer of the all-party parliamentary group on China will be grateful for a cheque. If we have the resources, we as parliamentarians will do a great deal more to deepen and thicken relations with China. Can we please have encouragement from the Department for Education and Skills to promote Mandarin in schools and colleges? Can we also have some encouragement from the Department of Trade and Industry and Trade Partners UK to help UK companies understand more about Chinese culture so that we can make much greater and longer-lasting trade relationships with China?

4.16 pm

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor) (Con): I, too, would like to thank the Minister for providing the opportunity for this important debate. I begin by quoting from a statement made two weeks ago:

"China is undergoing a process of deep change. In order to effect this change smoothly and without chaos and violence I believe it is essential that there be more openness and greater freedom of information and proper awareness among the general public. We should seek truth from facts—facts that are not falsified. Without this China cannot hope to achieve genuine stability. How can there be stability if things must be hidden and people are not able to speak out their true feelings? China's emergence as a regional and global power is also accompanied by concerns, suspicion and fears about her power. Hosting the Olympic Games and World Exposition will not help to dispel these concerns. Unless Beijing addresses the lack of basic civil and political rights and freedoms of its citizens, especially with regard to minorities, China will continue to face difficulties in reassuring the world that she is a peaceful, responsible, constructive and forward-looking power."

That seems to be a commendable and astute analysis of China's current position, and it is very helpful to our debate. The author of those words is the Dalai Lama, speaking in characteristically open and generous terms—especially when one considers how the Chinese have treated him and his long-suffering people for more than half a century.

I welcome the opportunity to debate China's current position. I recognise the current enormous importance of China and the need for constructive dialogue. We have heard good examples of the work done by the all-party group, and its work should be commended. Like many in this House, including my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) and the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope), and many people in the country, however, I see the debate on China really as an opportunity to raise the subject of Tibet. Nobody should be surprised by that, and China in particular should not be surprised. It brings the situation on its own head.

All over the world there are countless people who will never be prepared to treat China on the terms it wishes until there is a proper resolution of the many human rights issues that exist there for its minorities and religious groups, and particularly until the question of Tibet is settled.

The British Government should not be surprised by the strength and depth of feeling about Tibet in this country either. That is partly because our country has had a particular historical relationship with Tibet, which meant, for a while, that we were responsible for that country and its future. However, it is also because of the widespread admiration in our country for the tormented people of Tibet and especially their leader, the Dalai Lama.

China has an unenviable recent history of dealings with Tibet. The invasion of Tibet was met throughout the civilised world with disgust, and a series of resolutions at the United Nations condemned Chinese human rights abuses in Tibet and called on China to respect the fundamental freedoms of the Tibetan people, including their right to self-determination. China has done none of those things.

In preparing for the debate I thought it might be of benefit to the House if I went over the historical material documenting the relations of the British and Chinese Governments with Tibet. I found, however, that the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) had already done so in an excellent Adjournment debate on 19 March 1999. He showed that Britain has regarded Tibet as a de facto independent state for years. He also asked the question that UK parliamentarians should ask: what is the British Government's current view of Tibet's status as a nation? Sadly, he received the standard answer, which successive Governments have used for many years: the Government regard

"Tibet as autonomous, while recognising the special position of China there."—[Official Report, 19 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 1463.]

What is so special about that "special position"? The word "special" can mean whatever one wants, which is why it is so beloved of the advertising industry. It means anything and nothing, and the Government should not hide beneath such weak and woolly language. Can the Minister explain what that "special position" is? What does it involve? What does it mean?

I will tell the Minister what is so special—in the real sense—about the Dalai Lama and Tibet. The Dalai Lama represents a country that has undergone the kind of suffering that has resulted in the violent uprising of the oppressed in other parts of the world, but does he look to us for weapons? No, he asks only for our good offices. Does he follow a policy of hatred and recrimination? No, he asks only to be allowed to negotiate in a peaceful and purposeful manner. The Dalai Lama is a rare phenomenon on the world stage: a true national leader who practises what other world leaders only preach—that progress should be made through peaceful negotiation rather than violent action. We are always being told that violence should not be rewarded, yet there are countless examples to the contrary.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood, I was struck by the fact that while we are here debating China, the Prime Minister is in Libya talking to President Gaddafi. I understand why he thinks that progress can best be made through dialogue with the Libyan leader, as opening doors must be better than keeping them closed, but surely there is a problem when the British Prime Minister makes an effort—many would say a commendable effort—to engage with former perpetrators of violence, but is not ready to talk to those who suffer from violence. It is good to reach out a cautious hand to those who have renounced violence, but should not we also stretch out our hands to those who have turned their faces away from violence from the start? That approach would make an important point in the war against terrorism.

I ask the Minister to consider how Tibetans will interpret the Prime Minister's visit to Libya, bearing it in mind that many Members have told us that the Prime Minister will not open his door to the Dalai Lama on his forthcoming visit to the UK at the end of May. I find it hard to believe that the Prime Minister simply will not have the time. Of course he should see the Dalai Lama, both as a point of principle and, especially, because of the expected visit of the Chinese Premier at around the same time.

Last July, I made a speech in the House in which I politely encouraged the Prime Minister to use his good offices on behalf of Tibet during a trip that he was about to make which included top-level meetings in China. I later wrote to him, asking whether he had been able to raise the subject of Tibet during his meetings in China and, if so, what response he had got. He replied that he had raised human rights with the Chinese Premier, and underlined our interest in an ongoing dialogue with China on human rights issues. He said that he had also discussed Tibet with the Chinese leadership and welcomed recent contact between the Chinese authorities and representatives of the Dalai Lama.

Well, that is something, but not much, although another opportunity will arise with the Chinese Premier's forthcoming visit. As my earlier polite approach did not seem to get very far, I believe that we should all increase the pressure on the Chinese, and on our Government. The Prime Minister should raise a number of matters when he sees the Chinese Premier, such as the talks between the Chinese and the Dalai Lama's representatives, which the Chinese have stalled. Those talks need to go ahead as soon as possible, without ridiculous preconditions on the Chinese side.

The Prime Minister should also—here I echo what my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood said—raise the position of the imprisoned Buddhist leader Tenzin Deleg Rinpoche. Why are the UK Government merely expressing concern about that case, rather than calling for it to be reopened with independent legal representation of Tenzin Deleg's choice, and for that trial to be held in the presence of international observers? That is what we routinely demanded during the show trials in the former Soviet Union, of which this case reminds us so powerfully.

There are many other cases of manifest injustice in Tibet—we heard one from the hon. Member for Hyndburn—that should be raised. Having done that, the Prime Minister should feel able to report to us that he has done so not just in general phrases but with some specific points that he raised and the responses that he received. In short, the Government should turn up the pressure and do so publicly. Surely we can do that without endangering our own national interests?

After all, we have many things that the Chinese are interested in and want. An opportunity was given to us by the review of the EU arms embargo on China which we have heard about. I was encouraged to hear the Minister say that he was considering joining the Americans in their current resolution at the Office of the UN High Commissioner on Human Rights in Geneva criticising Beijing's human rights record. The Chinese have got very upset about this. I can imagine some people at the Foreign Office saying, "No, no, no. That just goes to show that we shouldn't get involved in these things." I take the opposite view. To me it shows that we can get things moving with the Chinese only when we stand up for our principles. I also think, as others have said, that we should press the EU to think again about the appointment of a special representative on Tibetan issues.

The mistake in dealing with China is to believe, as some do, that the best place to be is somewhere just below the parapet. We have tried delicate diplomacy on human rights, but the Chinese interpret that as weakness. We did not deal with the former Soviet Union in this way: we did not go around apologising for bringing difficult matters up. We stuck to our guns and exposed where the real weaknesses lay.

To be frank, British Governments have largely kept their eyes shut on the question of China and human rights for a generation. During that time, the people of Tibet have been murdered, imprisoned and abused, and their religion, customs and culture have been fiercely attacked. Lhasa has been turned into a Chinese city and enormous ecological damage has been done to parts of the Tibetan landscape. Those are the fruits of keeping one's head below the parapet. China always interprets weak words as a cover for weak intentions. We should push our Government harder to be firmer and more precise about what they are doing.

I would like to conclude where I began, with the Dalai Lama's recent statement. He adds:

> "The Tibetan issue represents both a challenge and an opportunity for a maturing China to act as an emerging global player with vision and values of openness, freedom, justice and truth. A constructive and flexible approach to the issue of Tibet will go a long way in creating a political climate of trust, confidence and openness, both domestically and internationally. A peaceful resolution of the Tibetan issue will have wide-ranging positive impacts on China's transition and transformation into a modern, open and free society. There is now a window of opportunity for the Chinese leadership to act with courage and farsightedness in resolving the Tibetan issue once and for all."

I say that we should do more for the Tibetan people and do it openly. Only in that way will progress be made. I look to our Government to follow the calm and measured approach of the Dalai Lama, and to act with greater courage and determination.

4.29 pm

Ian Stewart (Eccles) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to contribute to this important debate. First, I wish to congratulate the Minister and acknowledge his role. He is genuinely interested in the subject of China. He has worked closely with the all-party group on China and has helped to improve the circumstances that some of my colleagues have addressed today, and I hope that he continues to do that. He has been put under pressure by my colleagues, and perhaps he will act on some of the points that they raised.

It would be remiss of me not to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman). I claim the credit for engineering his election to the chair when we founded the all-party group, because I knew that he had deep experience of China and that, like my colleagues and me, he is a friend of the Chinese people. So I congratulate my hon. Friend, who is a true China hand.

I am one of the vice-chairmen of the all-party group and I have visited China twice under its auspices. My hon. Friend and I represent constituencies in the northwest, which has links with China and has seen vibrant Chinese communities develop, particularly in Manchester and Liverpool.

I commend the work of Mr. Lee Kai Hung and the north-west Chinese council, which has taken several significant steps to encourage the active involvement of Chinese communities in civic life in the north-west. I also commend the council for its work in setting up an online welfare network for Chinese students in Britain—a model that could be transferred to students of other nationalities in this country.

This is an omnibus debate, so I want to comment briefly on several issues. My personal interest in China developed not from 20th century politics or economics, but from a lifelong fascination with Chinese history, culture, philosophy, martial arts and traditional Chinese medicine. China is an enormous country that is in transition from a command economy to what it calls a socialist market economy, which resonates with me. Today's debate has been balanced. Concerns have been expressed, but there has also been praise. Most importantly, there has also been some understanding. Key achievements of the all-party group under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend have been to raise awareness and to increase understanding among all hon. Members of the real challenges that China faces.

China is a massive country that is moving into a modern world, and those of us who have been lucky enough to visit it have seen Shanghai and Beijing on the well developed east coast, which without doubt matches anywhere in the developed world. As the group's visits progress, however, the chairman has been increasingly keen to see the group members visit the centre of China and, hopefully, the west, because there is in one country a modern and well developed east coast, a centre that is some 50 years or so behind that, and a western area that is almost mediaeval. Any Government who are trying to develop the interests of the whole country and all its people face many challenges.

There is a downside to China moving to a market economy like ours, not the least being unemployment. Chinese people under the old system had employment, housing and health care that may not have been to western standards but was at least secure. They now face unemployment without a welfare safety net of the sort that we have in the west. This is one of the areas in which the partnership between the UK and China is having really positive effects. My colleagues have highlighted today the fact that this is a two-way process, but I hope that China can embrace some of the benefits of western experience so that it can design systems for its people without making some of the mistakes that were made in the past. We, in turn, will learn from the Chinese experience, and I hope that that will be of benefit.

Chinese medicine is a unique medical system, which has made a significant contribution to health care in China and the UK, and I hope that you will allow me to comment on practice in this country, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Extensive though the Minister's talents are, I realise that he is not responsible for this aspect of Government policy, but it relates to the work that almost all the Departments that have been mentioned are doing on health, education, and trade and industry.

As far as we know, the introduction of traditional Chinese medicine into Europe dates back to about the 17th century. In the UK, interest in traditional Chinese medicine, and in acupuncture in particular, has largely developed since the 1970s. I am sure that Chinese medicine will become even more popular, and as it does, we will need to regulate it to ensure that it is safe and effective for patients.

I have established links with the Association of Traditional Chinese Medicine, which is campaigning for the introduction of a suitable regulatory framework. I had a meeting about the issue with the association and the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson). I should also tell hon. Members that the Shi Zen organisation of Manchester is organising an international conference on traditional Chinese medicine that will take place in Manchester from 9 to 11 June and will be attended by Ministers.

We in the north-west have a proud record of promoting trade and business co-operation with China, as well as cultural, educational and sporting exchanges. That helps to create trust and mutual understanding between the citizens of our two countries. The British Council in Manchester does invaluable work to promote education, science and technology in China, as well as our expertise on crucial issues such as the environment, which is a high priority in the UK and China. We also have strong links with China's consulate general, which is in Manchester.

China's entry into the World Trade Organisation in December 2001 further opened up the market for foreign investment and two-way trade, as well as creating a competitive environment from which British and Chinese companies can benefit. The recent creation of an international trade centre at Chamber Business Enterprises in Manchester is an important step towards raising the profile of the whole north-west. A variety of services is on offer to small and medium-sized businesses at the special China trade unit, which is an integral part of the centre.

In our joint desire to promote economic co-operation, peace and understanding, there is more to unite us and the Chinese people than to divide us. As has been highlighted, however, China is little studied in our schools. I fully appreciate the pressures on school curriculums, but I hope that Ministers and educationists will include China when they update courses to educate our children for their global future.

It is one of the privileges of membership of an all-party group that Members are sometimes asked to serve on expert bodies on associated subjects. My hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South and I have been pleased to serve for several years now on the executive of the Great Britain-China Centre. I must admit that our attendance record would not merit a single star rating, but that is because of the nature of business in the House. Nevertheless, we try to keep up with the centre's work. It is developing and running high-quality exchanges on a number of issues, including criminal justice, human rights, judicial training, constitutional government and the rule of law.

The centre's work on trade union rights are a particular interest of mine. As you and other colleagues know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am a lifelong trade union activist. My interest in international work through my trade union, the Transport and General Workers Union, started when I was about 18. We have heard today of the awesome growth of the Chinese economy. I believe that it was about 9 per cent. last year and is predicted to be 7 per cent. this year. Such growth will bring the greatest benefit for Chinese workers if they are represented by effective, free and independent trade unions that can deal with the issues that the Chinese workers identify as important, such as excessive working hours, inadequate holidays and the need for better health and safety provision. It is clear that Chinese workers are no different from workers the world over; they have the same concerns.

The Great Britain-China Centre works with the All-China Federation of Trade Unions, which is not an independent body, but is currently the main game in town. The body has positive attributes on which we can build. That is not to say that I do not understand workers seeking independent forms of representation, such as we have in the UK, but as outsiders we must aim to promote reform through all the channels open to us.

Chinese trade unions want training and skills so that they can do the best for their members in terms of collective bargaining and representation, and in seeking legislative reform. We have a wealth of UK expertise on this matter. I am pleased that the ACFTU is expanding its international links. The Great Britain-China Centre has helped the ACFTU to develop training materials and has funding to set up and run the first labour tribunal in China to hear labour disputes. We should encourage the ACFTU to democratise and develop its independence, and we should also work with, and encourage the growth and development of, any new free, independent and democratic trade union.

The centre hopes to expand in another area dear to my heart: the promotion of civil society and citizenship. The assessment is that the centre, with its non-official status, is well placed to engage with Chinese organisations seeking to promote civil society. We all too often forget, because we are a developed democracy and society, about the democratising effect that free, independent and democratic trade unions, working with private employers, can have in a society, and we should applaud that effect.

Within any democratic civil society we expect respect for human rights, religious tolerance and toleration of diversity. I must raise two issues that I hope that the Chinese Government will act on. First, there is the issue of the Falun Gong, an organisation that was declared illegal by Chinese authorities in 1999. A constituent of mine, Mr. Terence Shanahan, is an active member of the Falun Gong UK. He is a powerful advocate for the stated Falun Gong ideals of truthfulness, compassion and forbearance. I take no view on the nature of Falun Gong, but I am concerned about repeated reports of human rights abuses against its followers. In turn, I make no judgment about the obvious concerns that the People's Republic has about the organisation. However, I urge the People's Republic to exercise tolerance in relation to organisations such as Falun Gong. Any organisation should quite properly be established within the rule of law and any abuse by members of an organisation would be punishable within that rule of law.

The second issue that I should like to raise is Tibet, albeit briefly, as other hon. Members have talked about it at length. There has been some formal contact between the Chinese authorities and the representatives of the Dalai Lama. I welcome that and I hope that the time has come for sustained negotiations on Tibet without preconditions. There are hopes that the Prime Minister will be able to meet the Dalai Lama when he visits the UK in a few months. The Dalai Lama is a political and spiritual leader who seeks to resolve conflict through dialogue. That is something on which we can all reflect in these turbulent times. I urge the Prime Minister to raise the issue of Tibet with the Chinese Premier, when he, too, visits the UK this year. I hope that the Prime Minister will offer the Chinese Premier any assistance that the UK can give to help to resolve the issue.

When the Chinese Premier is here, I am sure that the Prime Minister will want to congratulate China on the important role that it has played in significantly easing tensions between Pakistan and India. For many years China has been seen to have close ties with Pakistan. However, in recent times it has sought co-operation with India in establishing joint infrastructure projects and focusing on energy and water resources and co-operation in science, technology and other areas. China is well placed to assist dialogue when relationships are strained and to point out the benefits of mutual co-operation, while acknowledging that differences need to be resolved, and it should be congratulated on its work towards world peace.

China is a major world player and has taken its place at the world table. It has exercised a mature and responsible attitude in its financial policies, which are designed to maintain economic stability in the south-east Asian region. When the south-east Asian crisis was abroad, China could have devalued its currency, but that would have had a destabilising effect in the regional and world economy. China chose not to do that and acted responsibly, and we should acknowledge that.

China is clearly developing a more open and transparent approach in its relations with other countries. That approach may not yet meet the standards that we expect in the west, but we should acknowledge that China is developing and improving. We should hold hands with our Chinese friends, work through our respective concerns and develop a positive partnership for the benefit of both the Chinese and the British people.

4.48 pm

Mr. Rammell: It is a common occurrence to start a ministerial summing up by saying that we have had a well informed debate, which is sometimes the case and sometimes not. I genuinely believe that this debate has been well informed. The level of knowledge of, commitment to and interest in Chinese affairs has been apparent during this short debate, which, as a number of hon. Members said, the Government initiated. We were pleased to do that.

The hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Trend) started by asking for the date of the Chinese Premier's visit to this country. No announcement has been made, but one will be made in due course. I hope that that is the least full answer that I shall give to the various points that have been raised.

[Mr. Rammell]

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) had to leave, but not before raising his concern about the one-child policy in China. The Government condemn coercive family planning programmes, wherever they occur. Through the Department for International Development, we have funded the UN family development programme, which works closely on the ground with the Chinese authorities to help turn coercive policies into policies of real choice. There has been significant cross-party concern about the issue. In 2002, a cross-party group of three Members undertook a visit to China to see at first hand the work that was being done. According to their reports, they came back much reassured by what they had seen. The then Secretary of State for International Development raised the issue with her counterpart in 2002, and the Chinese authorities gave assurances that China was working towards relaxing the one-child policy. We welcome that.

Tibet was discussed by several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). I pay tribute to the work that he and the all-party group on Tibet do on the issue. There are still particular concerns about the situation in Tibet, and the British Government are deeply worried about reports of arbitrary detention, torture and the re-education of monks and nuns. It is certainly not the case that we have ignored Tibet. Indeed, a few months ago I had a detailed discussion with the hon. Gentleman and his all-party group about it. We raise the matter, including specific individual cases, at every suitable opportunity right up to the highest level, and have urged, and will continue urge, the Chinese authorities to continue negotiations with representatives of the Dalai Lama to find a lasting solution that is acceptable to the people of Tibet.

The hon. Member for Windsor asked about the Government's view of the status of Tibet. He asked the question and gave the answer, but for the record I shall repeat it. He said that successive British Governments have regarded Tibet as autonomous, while recognising the special position of the Chinese authorities. That continues to be the Government's view. We believe that the Tibetans should have a greater say in the running of affairs in Tibet and that the best way to achieve that is through dialogue without preconditions between the Chinese Government and the Dalai Lama. That is what we have urged and will continue to urge publicly and privately.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) began his contribution by referring to the all-party group. I was aware of its considerable work and influence, but I did not appreciate that 256 MPs were members of it. That underlines the significant depth of interest in the issue throughout parties in the House.

My hon. Friend also obliquely raised an issue that other hon. Members followed up more succinctly and assertively about funding for all-party visits. It is a matter of real concern, and not easy to resolve. The Treasury certainly has a view about funding all-party visits from departmental programmes. Political considerations must also be taken into account. I ask gently whether it is really appropriate and whether we really want to advocate that the Government of the day should have an influential say on which all-party groups will be funded for which purposes in which particular countries.

Ian Stewart rose—

Mr. Wilkinson rose—

Mr. Rammell: Clearly, I have started something that I may regret. I shall take some interventions.

Mr. Wilkinson: I thank the Minister for his approachability and willingness to listen on many issues relating to his area of responsibility, including Tibet. I personally welcome his view about the proposed funding by the Executive branch of the activities of particular all-party country groups. I treasure very much the independence of parliamentary groups per se as representatives of the legislative branch.

Mr. Rammell: I welcome that comment and understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying. In a sense, that was my point, but a concern has been expressed and all of us in the Government and across parties in the House need to think about how we respond to it.

Ian Stewart: I, too, would defend the independence of the groups, but we also want the dosh. On a more serious note, the Minister alluded to political considerations—not least, perhaps, the views expressed by the media about Members enjoying junkets. How could anybody, listening to the depth and importance of the subjects raised in the debate and hearing how UK politicians interface with their counterparts in a country such as China, fail to see that it is genuine and necessary work?

Mr. Rammell: My hon. Friend makes an exceedingly good point. The media's characterisation of the work of Members in that regard and in many others is so wide of the mark that it is not true. We have all contributed to the current state of apathy—I can put it no stronger than that—over the conduct of government and politics in this country. However, media misrepresentation of the work and the role of Members does not help at all. The point about funding has been made and we will undoubtedly return to it.

The hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Brian Cotter) stated that he was pleased to have benefited from Chinese medicine. The matter was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart). I am not medically qualified but my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) is—or at least I think she is. She is no longer present, however, so I will leave my remarks at that, although I am glad that the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare benefited.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eccles raised the issue of student numbers. The latest figures from the Department for Education and Skills show that there are currently 35,000 students from mainland China in Britain; there are other Chinese students in further education and in schools, about 13,000 university students from Taiwan, and about 10,000 students from Hong Kong. The figures have increased significantly in recent years, which is partly because of the Chinese population's growing interest in this country, and partly because we have driven those numbers as a result of the Prime Minister's initiative.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud raised justifiably significant concerns about freedom of religion. Our serious concerns continue about the treatment of Christians and other religious practitioners in China who are not members of state-sanctioned religious organisations and about the Chinese Government's failure to allow full freedom of religious belief. We continue to take it up in human rights dialogue and at all other appropriate ministerial and official levels.

I have already paid tribute to the work done in the all-party group by the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood. He raised several significant human rights concerns, and I reiterate what I said at the start of the debate: we continually raise such issues publicly and privately, and we will continue to do so.

In parliamentary terms, the hon. Gentleman then took a sideswipe at the Prime Minister's visit to Libya today. I genuinely believe that the most serious threat we face is international terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. When a country such as Libya has committed itself to remove those weapons, it should be welcomed, and the Prime Minister's visit is part of that approach. The visit is widely understood and supported in all parts of the House, and I hope that that will be true of the media.

The hon. Gentleman also raised an issue about the Dalai Lama's visit this summer. I will be clear: the point is not one of principle; the Prime Minister has met the Dalai Lama before, but he cannot this time because of diary constraints. The Dalai Lama will, however, be met by the Foreign Secretary and other Government figures.

Along with other hon. Members, the hon. Gentleman also raised the case of Tenzin Deleg Rinpoche. We have regularly and persistently raised that case with the Chinese Government, and I have personally raised it in Beijing. We supported the three European Union démarches in February, and in their response to the most recent démarche in February, the Chinese said that the sentence is likely to be commuted to life imprisonment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope) is no longer present, but I am grateful for his comments. He raised a number of exceedingly important points. He referred to the case of Jampel Changchub, which we have raised regularly through our own dialogue and while working for clemency. We believe that his sentence has recently been reduced slightly, but I shall continue to liaise on that in correspondence with my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend referred to the EU arms embargo, which is a complicated issue. It is important that we return to the context in which the embargo was first established and the immediate aftermath of the events of Tiananmen square. I repeat what I said at the start of my contribution: the House should be reassured that even if the embargo were lifted, that would emphatically not remove our ability to control arms sales to China. The EU code of conduct, interpreted by the UK Government through the consolidated criteria, will remain in place as the means of controlling arms exports to China. That is important.

My hon. Friend raised significant concerns about the use of the judicial death penalty in China. We are deeply concerned about that and it is one of the main themes of the human rights dialogue. I had been a Minister for only a couple of weeks when I first attended the human rights dialogue, and I spent about 50 minutes discussing the specific issue of the death penalty with my interlocutor. Hon. Members will understand that some of the dialogue takes place through formal processes.

After a long discussion of 50 minutes, my opposite number responded by saying that we must understand that China is at a different stage of development. We oppose the death penalty, but I felt that through that process of engagement it was possible to put our views forward. We received that eventual response, which was not the Chinese Government's initial formal response. That indicates that we can make progress on such issues. I welcome the fact that China has said that abolition of the death penalty is a long-term goal. There is undoubtedly a long way to go—that was reinforced by the figures quoted by my hon. Friend—but we welcome the recent greater openness on statistics and we will continue to press the issue with the Chinese Government, just as we press for abolition of the death penalty throughout the world wherever it occurs.

My hon. Friend also referred to the importance of continuing to review the progress and merits of the human rights dialogue. We most definitely do that. He said specifically that many of the cases that we raise with the Chinese authorities individually are not taken seriously. I believe that the evidence of the progress that we are making points in the opposite direction. In November 2002, we raised 44 individual cases with the Chinese authorities and received a response on 16. In November 2003, we received a response on almost 100 per cent. of cases. That does not mean that we get everything that we ask for, or the response that we want in every case, but it suggests that there is a greater willingness on the part of the Chinese authorities to open up and to discuss the issues.

My hon. Friend rightly, acknowledged that, by and large, non-governmental human rights organisations, whatever criticism they may make of our progress, support and welcome the bi-annual human rights dialogue. They are right, and while we keep the matter under review we shall continue to proceed on that basis.

The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) started by referring to the judicial ouster in the context of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Bill. I may have misunderstood—I apologise if I did—but I thought that he was trying to compare our human rights record with that of China. If that was his intention, I ask him to reflect on what he said and whether he seriously intended to put that point of view forward. I do not believe that that is sustainable.

Tony Baldry: Hon. Members should be careful not to see everything in black and white and seek to cast other countries as totally black and us as totally white. I commend Helena Kennedy's book to the hon. Gentleman. It shows that there are many grey areas and difficulties that we all face. What might look like a human rights abuse in one country may not be so. I think that we must be careful not to be totally sanctimonious on such matters.

Mr. Rammell: Sanctimoniousness is something that I try to avoid. The reasonable manner in which the hon. Gentleman has now made his point is far more comprehensible. We do not take the view that we have a perfect human rights record. I do not think that any country has such a record. However, I think that the particular concerns with the Chinese Government are ones that we are right to continue to pursue.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue of the teaching of Chinese in British schools. Clearly that is a matter for the Department for Education and Skills. I know that the DFES is interested in encouraging links between Chinese and UK schools. That is important. The fact that it is now possible to study Mandarin at GCSE level is welcome. I know that there have been some concerns, which we have considered in Government, about the development and expansion of the teaching of Chinese studies in higher education. In all probability, that is a matter to which we shall return.

The hon. Member for Windsor cut to the quick of the debate by asking the fundamental question: do we get anywhere with the issues that we raise with the Chinese authorities? I will not give a glib answer to that. Engaging with a huge superpower that has the largest population in the world and that will be the second biggest economy in the world in a relatively short period is complicated. I hope that it is reasonable to say that an ongoing judgment must be made about the rhetoric that we use and how that might either help or hinder us in terms of leverage with the Chinese Government. That is the judgment that we constantly have to make throughout the world, and we certainly have to make that judgment with China.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue of urging the appointment of a European Union special representative on Tibet. That is something that we have discussed with European Union partners. We honestly do not feel that such an appointment would help at the moment. Part of the rationale is that the US equivalent does not seem to have made any significant difference in that regard. The issue is something that we will continue to consider.

I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles for his kind remarks. I think that his contribution was genuinely well informed—as were many contributions—particularly from a constituency perspective and because of his links with the Chinese community. He also hit on the head one of the key issues in terms of the internal development of China, which is the split between the east, the centre and the west of China. There is a world of difference between those regions, as people who have travelled in the country will know. It is not only east and west, but urban and rural. One of the difficult issues that the Chinese authorities have to handle is the migration that takes place from rural to urban centres. I am reassured to know that the position of the new Chinese leadership marks one of the key changes of orientation and emphasis from that of the previous leadership. That is welcome.

My hon. Friend also raised the issues of his role in the Great Britain-China Centre and of trade unions. I think that the work that the Great Britain-China Centre does in employment law is very positive, particularly the good project that was run on collective bargaining two years ago. It is also a fact that the issue of labour rights and trade union rights featured strongly in the human rights dialogue that we held in November 2002, in which we involved the TUC, ACAS, Unison and others. We will continue to press the Chinese to lift their reservation to article 8.1a of the international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights, which concerns the right to join a trade union. We have long campaigned and argued for that in this country. I do not think that we should move away from that view in terms of what we advocate anywhere in the world. My hon. Friend He also raised the issue of adherence to Falun Gong. Like him, I do not take a view on the nature of Falun Gong and nor do the Government; nevertheless we urge that the rights of Falun Gong adherents be respected.

I genuinely believe that we have had a productive, well informed and constructive debate. China is a huge, developing global superpower with which, for the series of reasons that I listed at the beginning—climate change, economic opportunity and world security—we must continue to engage. That does not mean that there are not differences that we will air both publicly and privately. We need to keep working at the relationship. The contributions this afternoon, like the work of the all-party group, will continue to help us in that regard.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eleven minutes past Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 30 March 2004

[MR. EDWARD O'HARA in the Chair]

Sustainable Energy Act

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Margaret Moran.]

9.30 am

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I am delighted to have been successful in the ballot for this debate on an extremely important topic. I hope that the Minister will be able to give us some firm, practical and robust answers.

The background to the debate is the success of the Sustainable Energy Act 2003, which was a private Member's Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White), who hopes to join us later. An important provision in that Act is section 2(1), which states:

"The Secretary of State must within one week beginning with the coming into force of this section designate under this subsection at least one energy efficiency aim."

The designation of that energy efficiency aim is at the core of what I want to say today, although it is part of the bigger topics of promoting sustainability and eradicating fuel poverty in housing, and—this is not incidental—building up a viable energy efficiency industry in the United Kingdom, with the accompanying employment and economic prospects.

The Minister has a good idea of what I am going to say, not least because he has already heard it in stereo from just about every part of the spectrum. For a start, 332 hon. Members signed early-day motion 96, which sets out the core of the subject. Overall, 420 hon. Members have signed early-day motions or voted or spoken in debates in support of the sustainable energy aim set out in the 2003 Act. We are still waiting for that aim. If that is not enough, the Secretary of State has received a joint letter from every environmental non-governmental organisation asking when the aim will be published and what it is.

A similar letter was received by the Secretary of State from every fuel poverty NGO and other relevant organisations. In addition, just about every trade association and group of manufacturers and installers of energy efficiency equipment has also written in the same terms. The Minister has heard about the matter not just in stereo but quadrophonically. His Department knows the script, but I want to ask, on the record, some pertinent questions and I hope that he, in turn, will put some robust and positive answers on the record.

To go back a little, we need to emphasise the importance of developing a sustainable environmental policy and to remind ourselves that 27 per cent. of the carbon dioxide emissions produced in the United Kingdom come from homes and houses. We are living a lifestyle that needs three planets to be sustainable, not the one that we have. I am hoping that, apart from any assurances that the Minister can give on this subject, he will say that there is a determination throughout the Government to ensure that our homes and housing stock are far more sustainable in future than they have been in the past and that the Government intend to play an active part in promoting that. I particularly hope that he will explain to his ministerial colleagues the need to designate a requirement on the Thames gateway site for perhaps 2,000 zero-energy homes, which could kick-start the whole sustainable housing market.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this Adjournment debate. The subject is important. He referred to the Thames gateway, and he will be aware that my constituency is in that area. Many of the 40,000 people on Canvey Island live 6 ft below sea level. The argument is not just academic, because within 40, 50 or perhaps 80 years, the flood defences will again be threatened. If we are to build another 2,000 houses in the Thames gateway—it is said that some will be on the flood plain—it is very important that we tackle global warming and CO_2 emissions, which increased by 1.5 per cent. last year and have increased in three years out of the past four. Clearly, the Government must do something.

Mr. Stunell: I agree. The hon. Gentleman has the fortune, or possibly the misfortune, to represent a constituency that will be directly affected if global warming proceeds unchecked, and he makes a valuable point.

When the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East introduced his Bill, as it then was, the relevant clause stated that the Government should set "targets". I served on the Committee that considered the Bill, as did other hon. Members here, and there was a considerable tussle between the Government and the Bill's supporters about the precise wording. Eventually, the Government prevailed and the word "aims" was substituted for "targets". That represented a serious watering down. Revisiting the Committee transactions, I see that there was a great deal of concern, not to say bitterness, on both sides of the Committee when the change was made. I am not sure whether this is a parliamentary term, but I slagged off the promoter of the Bill somewhat for his faint-heartedness. However, as I am now steering my own private Member's Bill through the system, I can see how such things happen and I am somewhat more forgiving of the fact that he felt the need to buckle under Government pressure.

The Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services said in Committee that we need have no fear that the word "targets" was being replaced by "aims". He said that that had to do with chapter 3 of the White Paper, which set out the Government's aims. He said that they were still the Government's aims and that the Bill's proposals would be "helpful in achieving them" He also said that

"to deliver our commitments, in particular in chapter 3, we will work with the energy efficiency industry, and others who have an interest".—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 24 June 2003; c. 56–58]

Given that assurance, does it matter that, nine months later, interdepartmental shilly-shallying is blocking all progress, scaring away investors in the energy efficiency industry and undermining the achievement of the United Kingdom's CO_2 targets? As the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) said, it certainly does matter, because UK CO_2 emissions are increasing. They increased in three of the past four years, most recently by 1.5 per cent. A Minister from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs dismissed that as simply "a blip", but if, in three years out of four, instead of working towards our target, we are going in the opposite direction, that is more than a blip.

We are moving away from the Kyoto targets to which the Government signed up, and we all know that energy efficiency is the most cost-effective way to cut CO_2 emissions and get back on track. It not only helps us to achieve the Kyoto targets but enables households to save on their fuel bills and improves their comfort and health. It can also make a major impact on fuel poverty reduction. Furthermore, if there was steady and sustained investment in energy efficiency, driven by clear public policy, we would see growth in jobs and economic progress in the industry and throughout the economy.

However, when we consider the record since June, we see that there has instead been a tremendous amount of weaselling by Ministers and Departments. At the time, the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services said that we need not worry, because there were 135 targets in the White Paper and the aims in the Bill would be a way of harnessing the fulfilment of at least some of them. However, he was a little elusive in Committee about precisely which ones, and closer inspection shows why. Although there are 135 targets in the White Paper, amazingly, none is about energy efficiency. It says only that there is an expectation that there will be a carbon reduction—there is not a target.

In the absence of any definition of the aims set out in section 2, which was supposed to be given within one week of its coming into force, no one knows what they are supposed to do to implement Government policy on energy efficiency. That means that everyone in the energy efficiency industry is pretty much stalled. They cannot go to the bank manager to raise money to invest on expanding their business to fulfil an undefined expectation and an absent aim. They need a bankable commitment. They need a target. At the very least they need a published aim. They need that even more having been led up the aisle and dumped more than once before by the Government, such as on cavity wall insulation in 1999.

The energy efficiency industry needs something that is published and bankable all the more because after the Minister made his announcement in June 2003, the Government promptly cut their expectation in half. Instead of talking about a saving of 5 million tonnes of carbon by 2010, they started to talk about a 4 million to 6 million tonnes saving by 2020. From the industry point of view, that is simply unacceptable. Perhaps not surprisingly, there has been no development and no expansion, and no effort yet to move in the direction set out in the Sustainable Energy Act.

After downgrading the expectation by 50 per cent., the Government sent a memo to the Environmental Audit Committee last May in which the then Energy Minister, the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), confirmed the smaller figure. It was repeated on 16 September 2003 by Lord Evans, the Government spokesman in the House of Lords.

The level of confusion at that time was such that director of the Association for the Conservation of Energy, Andrew Warren, took up the matter with the permanent secretary at the Department of Trade and Industry, Sir Robin Young. He pointed out the problems caused by not having a published aim and the expectation being halved. In a letter dated 22 August, Sir Robin replied:

"I can certainly confirm that the Government remains committed" to the White Paper figures

"of around 5 MtC by 2010."

In addition, it was agreed by the Department that Lord Evans's words in the House of Lords were an error, and in another letter to Mr. Warren, dated 19 September, Sir Robin wrote:

"I am happy to confirm that the 4 to 6 MtC saving quoted by Lord Evans was intended as a reference to additional annual savings by 2020, over and above the 5 MtC by 2010".

Quite remarkably he continued:

"the Hansard Editor of Debates has offered to include a clarification in the Bound Volume and we will be writing to her to confirm this."

The bound volume for that period has not yet been published, so I cannot confirm that that has happened.

By this time, there was much concern and confusion. Baroness Maddock asked a parliamentary question last October and received a further assurance that we were talking about 5 million tonnes by 2010 and a further 4 million to 6 million tonnes by 2010. Lord Whitty, speaking to the all-party group for intelligent energy on 10 December said:

"We must reach the ambitious targets for energy efficiency in the Energy White Paper. Without this all the other objectives will not be achieved".

That is perhaps the first time the Government have used the word "targets". The figures in the White Paper are now officially referred to as "targets", despite all the Government's efforts to replace that word with "aims" in the Sustainable Energy Bill.

In his consultation document, "Economic instruments to improve household energy efficiency", the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Government are still working towards their aim of saving 5 million tonnes of carbon from domestic energy efficiency by 2010. That suggests that, despite a minor wobble, things are back on course. We must consider the process by which the Government will publish that aim. That takes us back to what the Minister offered in the debate last June when he said:

"In order to deliver our commitments, we will work with the energy efficiency industry, and others who have an interest." — [Official Report, Standing Committee C, 24 June 2003; c. 56.]

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman is making a strong case, but would he, like me, accept that one of the underlying problems has been the fact that the Government have some form in cutting the warm front programme, which is crucial to eradicating fuel poverty? The only way in which that can be done in a sustainable way is by introducing energy efficiency, and the Government must get that programme back on track. Does he agree?

Mr. Stunell: Yes, I very much agree. If we have more time, I should like to explore that issue more fully. Unfortunately, there is not just uncertainty about how the Sustainable Energy Act will be implemented, and when the aims will be published, but all the energy efficiency industry's experience of Government action is negative. Warm words were said in 1999 about cavity wall insulation and now about the warm front programme. The situation has built up and just when things might be starting to happen, a great deal has been knocked down. It makes it all the more difficult for somebody running a company, thinking that they might take advantage of new market opportunities, to visit the bank manager and say, "I have this real opportunity," without being laughed at. The climate for business investment that the Government set is very important. I understood that one of the badges of new Labour was to be finely tuned to the needs of business, compared with their previous incarnations. On this issue, they seem to have gone completely off track.

In June last year, the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services offered to "work with the energy efficiency industry, and others who have an interest". —[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 24 June 2003; c. 56.]

The Secretary of State is well briefed on what the industry and those other interests want: they all want to see the 5 million tonnes of carbon that will be saved by energy efficiency set out as a clear aim in legislation, which will then underpin their own programmes for investment and targeting the problem.

Every energy efficiency company and trade association signed a joint letter sent to the Minister and to every hon. Member, saying that it was imperative to set those targets. It said:

"If we are to secure the necessary funding, then absolute and unambiguous quantified carbon saving commitments will be needed from the Government."

The Government face a completely unanimous view from every outside body and interest, as well as from the 332 hon. Members who signed the early-day motion, yet they still have not set those targets. The reason for applying for this debate has been enhanced by the letter now being circulated by the Economic Secretary, which was sent to a number of hon. Members. I quote from the version sent to the hon. Member for Conwy (Mrs. Williams), which is dated 12 March 2004. It says that:

"rather than setting specific targets it is more important to put in place the right incentives for individuals to take up energy efficiency."

In other words, we will not have targets or aims, but simply incentives. We know that incentives do not work. They have not worked for 25 years and there is not the slightest evidence that they will work in the next 25 years, so the letter completely tears up the script that Ministers laid out when they were amending the Sustainable Energy Bill in June 2003. It tears up the script, carefully repairing the damage done by mis-speaking in the House of Lords to say, "No, the target of 5 million tonnes of carbon is a target based on the White Paper, so everybody except the Government is out of step." Actually, everybody, including half the Government, is in step, but half the Government are not.

Last week, 15 of the United Kingdom's leading companies involved in the manufacture, distribution and supply of energy wrote to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that they were "extremely concerned to have had sight of letters currently being sent to MPs by the Economic Secretary . . . about Energy Efficiency".

They went on to say:

"We know all too well from bitter past experience that 'incentives' without targets simply will not ensure the creation of sufficient business confidence to enable us to invest in plant, personnel and delivery structures. We should therefore be most grateful for your assurance that the Treasury does not intend to resile from the commitments given by Lord Whitty."

I hope that I have outlined some of the flip-flops that the Government have made on the issue. I ask the Minister whether he is willing to rescue the Act and his Government's reputation by flipping, or perhaps flopping, once more. Will he tell hon. Members whether the words of the Energy Minister in Committee in June 2003 still stand, or should we believe what their Lordships were told on 12 September 2003, that instead of reducing by 5 million tonnes by 2010, the aim is 5 million tonnes by 2020—an effective halving of the aim? Or is it what Lord Whitty said to the all-party group on 10 December 2003, reinstating the target of 5 million tonnes by 2010, plus another target of 4 million to 6 million tonnes by 2020? Or is it what the Economic Secretary wrote in his letter of 12 March 2004, that we will not have any aims or targets at all and that everything will be done by incentives? Which of those multiple versions of the truth is the one that the Minister wants to give hon. Members today? Will he please make it the most positive and robust that he can? Otherwise his sustainability policy will not go anywhere.

There has been a lot of confusion, not among those who supported the legislation or the 332 hon. Members who want to see the list of aims and targets produced, but in Government. I do not know whether that is the result of careful and deliberate debate or whether it is because, as is often the case on energy policy, every Department is at sixes and sevens with every other Department. Whatever the process has been, the consequences are the same. The confusion and uncertainty mean that there has been no investment or planning and that we are nowhere near fulfilling the needs of the Government and the policy that the Minister professes to support.

I ask the Minister, who has the uncomfortable job of speaking for the Government and for DEFRA this morning, to give the reassurance sought by the manufacturing companies in the letter sent to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 26 March that the Government will set a specific target. Specifically, will he put it on the record that they support the higher target of 5 million tonnes by 2010 and the extended 4 million to 6 million extra by 2020? We need a clear sense of purpose and direction. Will he publish at least one aim as soon as possible, so that the industry can get to work on the job? Will he give an assurance that he will relay to other Departments the strong and firm view that an excellent way to start on the objective of developing sustainable housing would be to set a target of 2,000 zero-energy homes at Thames gateway?

[Mr. Stunell]

At one level, this is a technical and impenetrable debate about the implementation of one aspect of a private Member's Bill, which 99 per cent. of the public have probably not heard of. At another level, the debate can be used as a bit of partisan fun and knockabout because the Government have, yet again, not got their act together. However, I hope that we will view the debate in a third way: if we want the UK to be a world leader in providing for a sustainable planet, we must get right these decisions, which the Government perhaps consider as being at the micro-level—trivial or below the radar. Such decisions can mount up, as one brick after another in the wall, to provide a proper sustainability policy. I hope that I have illustrated the problem, and I look forward to the Government telling me what the answer is.

9.57 am

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): It is a pleasure to take part in the debate, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) on winning the ballot, thus allowing us to air our views this morning. Energy efficiency is extremely important for saving people from fuel poverty. I shall tackle the debate from that angle and stress fuel poverty more than energy efficiency.

We have had a mild winter, so we have not seen the alarming headlines of previous winters. Whether climate change will continue to save us from those headlines, none of us can say, but we were lucky this winter and fewer people than usual died from hypothermia. We have been lucky this year, but we need to make more progress in energy efficiency.

According to the Fuel Poverty Advisory Group's second annual report of 2003–04, between 1.4 million and 2 million people were in fuel poverty in 2001. Those figures represent a substantial reduction—a halving—of the 1996 figure. Therein lies one of the problems: the definition of fuel poverty. The usual definition revolves around the 10 per cent. or more of income that people have to spend on fuel to maintain the heating of their home as well as the cooking and lighting. According to the charity National Energy Action, the figures change depending on the definition of income. The Government take into account full income, including receipt of benefits, and on that basis, 1.8 million people were in fuel poverty in 2001. However, on the basis of basic income, the figure would increase to 2.4 million. The ideal would be to consider disposable income after housing costs have been paid, whether that is a mortgage or rent to a social or private landlord, in which case the figures increase substantially. When we look at figures that show people left in housing poverty, we must take those facts into consideration.

Rising incomes and benefit levels and falling fuel prices contributed significantly to the reduction that I have just mentioned. The incoming Labour Government reduced VAT on fuel to 5 per cent. in 1997, which helped tremendously, and later introduced the winter fuel allowance, which also helped considerably and which was increased recently for some pensioners. An added benefit is that the Government have targeted benefits at the poorest pensioners to keep people out of fuel poverty. Other vulnerable groups have been similarly targeted with benefits. The average SAP—standard assessment procedure—rating for homes rose from 41.5 to 50.5 between 1991 and 2001, and from 39 to 49.4 in the same period for the 30 per cent. of households with the lowest incomes, so energy efficiency measures have obviously also contributed.

However, I have a worry about fuel prices, which have started to rise again. The biggest rises have been in Northern Ireland, where it has just been announced that, on top of an 11 per cent. increase in gas prices announced in October 2003, there is to be a further 20 per cent. increase. That is a staggering increase in one fuel price, never mind the knock-on effect on the price of electricity. It will be difficult to combat fuel poverty in the future if those trends continue. Increases in fuel prices are already beginning to dominate the headlines in the rest of the United Kingdom.

There are still about 4,000 communities throughout the United Kingdom with a cluster of more than 50 households that are as little as 2 km from a gas main. The Department of Trade and Industry has estimated that 120,000 households in such communities could be removed from fuel poverty merely by connecting them to the main. The Government are vigorously pursuing the pathfinder policy to connect 65,000 of those vulnerable households, along with 60,000 others.

Shortly, however, the United Kingdom will be importing up to 70 per cent. of its gas from the continent. That is one of my concerns. We will have virtually no control over the prices that the countries that supply the gas will charge the United Kingdom, not only for supplying the gas but for transporting it across the continent and under the channel. With the cost comes the added fear of a lack of security. I am pleased that energy is being discussed in the House of Lords in relation to the Energy Bill. I hope that the Bill will come before the House of Commons shortly. It has attracted much criticism, and I am sure that we can have that debate when it comes through. I want to see diversification in relation to the supply of energy, and not total reliance on importing 70 per cent. of gas from the continent, which could have a severe effect on fuel poverty in the future if we are not careful.

A 10 per cent. increase in electricity and gas prices increases the numbers in fuel poverty by half a million in the UK. As we have seen, there has been an increase of much more than 10 per cent. already in Northern Ireland. Consequently, at least half a million people pro rata have been rammed back into fuel poverty in that part of the United Kingdom alone.

The warm front, which is an excellent scheme and is much better today than it was in previous years, the energy efficiency commitment—the EEC—and schemes such as the network gas extension, to which I have just referred, are estimated to need £2.5 billion in resources over the period from 2005 to 2010. That is if we are to meet the Government's commitment to remove people from fuel poverty. If expenditure on the EEC is doubled, other programmes need to be increased by at least 50 per cent. to meet the Government's commitment. That is quite a staggering increase. We should bear it in mind that in the current year the resources committed to the warm front have decreased. I plead with the Minister to look at the excellent warm front scheme very carefully and allocate many more resources to it over the next five or 10 years.

If a broader definition of fuel poverty were taken, to which I referred obliquely at the beginning of my speech, the Government would have to commit not £2.5 billion but £3 billion extra in resources to meet their commitments. They have set a target to eliminate fuel poverty entirely by 2016, and by 2010 for the most vulnerable groups. From what I have already said, that cannot be achieved through business as usual. We have to accelerate our efforts to get people out of fuel poverty and to increase energy efficiency.

While I am on the subject of the warm front scheme, I want to flag up some people in my constituency who are in extreme fuel poverty but unable to do anything about it. Mrs. N receives disability living allowance for her son, who is aged four. Because the benefit is not paid directly to the householder—Mrs. N—or her spouse, the family are not eligible for a warm homes grant. That means that her son does not have the opportunity to grow up in a warm, safe environment. The benefit has to be paid to the householder in order to trigger the grant, which I do not think is right.

Another case in my constituency flags up a slightly different problem. Mrs. R was awarded a top-up grant of only £170 for her loft insulation. She did not really call for the insulation. People knocked on her door, persuaded her that it was a good thing, and because it did not cost her any money she let them go ahead and do it. Now, however, her central heating system is on the verge of breakdown and she is extremely anxious. She is only 53 years old, but she is disabled and in receipt of disability living allowance, income support and incapacity benefit. However, she cannot get the grant because of a small amount of money that was spent on a small amount of loft insulation in the past. She now has to consider remortgaging her property, but feels that the building society will not let her do so.

I notice that the Fuel Poverty Advisory Group's annual report for 2003–04 recommends to the Government that > "Work should be carried out to understand the circumstances of those not in receipt of a 'gateway' benefit but clearly in fuel poverty."

It also recommends that

> "The Warm Front Scheme Managers should have a small discretionary 'pot' of funds for those in urgent need of help, but not for a variety of reasons eligible for the schemes."

I completely endorse those recommendations, and hope that the Minister will take them seriously. The warm front scheme is an excellent one, but it needs to be examined again so that some extreme cases of fuel poverty, which are currently excluded for "rules are rules" reasons, are brought within its scope.

The warm front scheme deals with many people who are not in extreme fuel poverty, and people have flagged that up as a worry, but we should deal with whole areas where we know there is poverty. We know which are the most deprived wards in the country. Regrettably, several are in my constituency. I could take the Minister to some areas of my constituency and we could set a boundary in that deprived ward and work through it dealing with every household, instead of trying to pick out the ones that just qualify under the rules. Some people would have had energy efficiency measures carried out in their properties, but I bet most of the people in those deprived areas would have qualified anyhow if they had been called on, or if they had called on the managers of the scheme. Energy action areas are an excellent idea, and rather than mess about with a scattergun approach, it might be better to identify the most deprived areas of Britain and treat them wholesale.

In the Housing Bill debate, I said that the new build standards of energy efficiency are very high, in both the private and the social housing sectors. I said, too, that although the decent homes standard is good, and I applaud the Government for their target of bringing all social sector housing to a decent standard by 2010, it is sad that according to the Government's figures people are still being left behind in fuel poverty. That cannot be right; it must mean that the decent homes standard is not addressing the energy efficiency measures under which homes in the private and social housing sectors should be brought up to the standard for new build in the building regulations.

The Government have some excellent schemes: for example, the decent homes standard, and the housing health and safety rating system, which is introduced in the Housing Bill and is a great improvement on the present system for the refurbishment of homes. The Housing Bill takes into account houses in multiple occupation, although there are difficulties with the definition of those, which we shall no doubt debate again on Report. The different programmes are operating in silos; the Government schemes appear to have no consistent approach to energy efficiency and reducing fuel poverty.

The hon. Member for Hazel Grove hit on one of the difficulties when he said that there are too many Departments dealing with too many schemes, which leads to complications. That is not the Government's view. It may not be Labour party policy, but it is the Iddon policy that there should be an Energy Department and an Energy Minister, perhaps in the Cabinet, to bring schemes together, whether they come from the Department of Health, DEFRA, the DTI or the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. The schemes should be given to one Minister with the political drive to get on with it, co-ordinate them and remove Britain from the embarrassing position of being low in the league when it comes to preventing hypothermia and deaths from fuel poverty. I am ashamed that in a bad winter in this new century so many people are still dying from hypothermia.

10.13 am

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I support the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) and congratulate him on his good fortune in the ballot and on his eloquence.

I wholeheartedly support everything that the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) said; to summarise his closing remarks, he wanted joined-up government. As the promoter of the Warm Homes and Energy Conservation Act 2000, I am delighted that the Sustainable Energy Bill was enacted, but I am not entirely at ease with what has happened since.

I am delighted that the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) is here today. I was a sponsor of his private Member's Bill and I can empathise with him, and with other hon. Members who have promoted private Member's Bills, about the trials, tribulations and challenges of trying to put a Bill on to the statute book. I therefore congratulate the hon. Gentleman on promoting the Sustainable Energy Act 2003 and, following the wonderful briefing from the Association for the Conservation of Energy, everyone should support the hon. Member for Hazel Grove.

The Secretary of State is charged with setting an energy efficiency aim and taking reasonable steps to achieve it. I understand that Lord Whitty, with whom I dealt during the passage of my Bill, has given an assurance that the aim will be set after the Easter recess. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East and I know that we cannot rest on our laurels once we have been given ministerial reassurances, because Ministers come and go. However, it is the role of the civil service to advise Ministers, and hon. Members should be concerned about the Treasury's role in the matter.

I am delighted that the energy efficiency industry has sent an open letter to the relevant Secretaries of State. I hope that the Government will be impressed by, and will take notice of, the wonderful array of important people who have far more expertise than I pretend to have and who support the measure. I was intrigued to learn that the chief executive of Scottish Power, Ian Russell, was concerned about the Chancellor's failure to introduce in his recent Budget sufficient new measures to encourage consumers to be more energy efficient. He said that politicians need to work harder to drum the green agenda into consumers' hearts and minds. I do not believe that anything is more important than the environment and saving the planet, but the issue is not considered sexy at present. Perhaps we need people such as Britney Spears, Beyoncé, Jordan or my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), who speaks for the official Opposition today, to be associated with it. It is a great shame that young people do not consider this fundamental matter sexy. Members of Parliament know that the issue is not a huge vote winner at present. As soon as we start talking about the environment and energy-saving matters, everyone shrugs their shoulders and thinks, "Another boring technical speech", which is a shame. I hope that in his reply the Minister will say something to inspire our young people and the general population so that they regard the issue as sexy.

The then Environment Minister described increasing carbon emissions between 2002 and 2003 as "a blip". I very much agree with the plea of the chief executive of Scottish Power to Government Ministers. He believes that the Chancellor should have included major incentives for energy efficiency in his Budget and that the Government should be much more proactive in convincing consumers that energy efficiency is a good thing. He rightly said that people must be shown how to conserve energy and be given some fiscal incentive. He suggested, for example, that the Chancellor could introduce a lower rate of stamp duty for energy-efficient homes—I certainly support that—and that a penalty for persistent misusers of energy could be added later.

More than half the emission reductions needed to achieve the UK's carbon emission targets are expected to come from energy efficiency. I am a member of the Health Committee, and have absolutely no doubt that many health problems are associated with environmental pollution. The incidence of brain tumours and asthma, for example, is increasing. There are many such illnesses, and I hope that the general public will become aware of their causes.

I am delighted that the Energy Saving Trust has revealed the huge potential for UK homes to become energy independent and self-sufficient by investing in renewable energy alternatives.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): Does not the investment climate dictate whether companies invest, and is that climate not affected by uncertainty about Government expectations and requirements? Industry has heard it all before, and is concerned that there has not been effective action. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the key to the matter is ensuring that the investment climate results in the introduction of measures that he identifies as necessary?

Mr. Amess: I absolutely agree with the hon. Gentleman, and I hope that the Minister will find time to respond to that point.

I note that Powergen intends to target 500,000 homes in an energy efficiency drive. It will spend a great deal of money on that work and will contribute to the Government's energy efficiency commitment. In response to the remarks of the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East about fuel poverty, there has been a great debate about how it should be defined, but we all know that it exists. Although Warm Front has been more successful than the home energy efficiency scheme that it replaced, the fact that more grants are being provided does not mean that fuel poverty is being eliminated. Many people remain unaware of the Warm Front scheme. As the hon. Gentleman said, there is no link between eligibility and energy efficiency in people's homes. I am disappointed by the take-up of the scheme; we need to be more proactive in promoting it to the general public.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East did us a huge service in introducing the Sustainable Energy Bill in Parliament. However, hon. Members cannot sit back and expect this Government, or any Government, to meet the aims of that measure. I hope that the Minister will give us a clear statement on the matter, in advance of what Lord Whitty might say after Easter.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): Let us put the debate in context: the central driver in all energy policy should be the 60 per cent. saving of CO_2 by 2050. So far, progress towards achieving that aim has not been impressive. We are in danger of fiddling while the planet burns.

There is a developing school of thought in the scientific community that the 60 per cent. target is insufficient, and that we should be looking at savings of at least 80 per cent. It behoves us, for the sake of future generations, to take effective action now, in addition to some of the more detailed considerations that we have discussed this morning. Otherwise our grandchildren or great grandchildren, if they are still alive, will not have a good word to say for us, and they will be quite right because we will have abdicated our responsibility to future generations.

The Government have an important role to play. Britain is in a position—perhaps a unique one—to set an example to the world in energy policy. However, although I hate to have to say it about my own Government, we are not doing that effectively at present. The Minister may be able to offer suggestions as to why those difficulties are occurring, even under a Labour Government. I believe that part of the problem stems from the fact that four major Departments of State are involved in energy policy, and they do not co-operate as well as they should. There is a departmental silo over there and one down the road, and some of the people in those Departments, not necessarily the Ministers, look enviously at each other and guard their turf rather than putting their heads together and making coherent policy.

We are discussing provisions that are a continuation of some of those in my Home Energy Conservation Bill, which Members may remember ran into trials and tribulations similar to those referred to by the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell). I do not care whether we call something a target, an aim or an aspiration; that is dancing on a head of a pin. What matters is that we act, and we need to see the setting out of clear aims, targets or aspirations, whatever we call them, and clear mechanisms for achieving them. It is that combination that will appease the energy conservation industry, which has stimulated this debate, and ultimately produce results.

We are still not doing anything that does not cost anything, which is strange. For instance, the Housing Bill will license houses in multiple occupation, which provide some of the worst housing and domestic energy conditions in the country. My constituency is full of old terrace houses with a SAP rating in single figures, let alone one of 40 or 50. Impoverished tenants are still sitting over single-bar electric fires, keeping an anxious eye on the meter and hoping that their money does not run out. We have the magnificent target of not only getting a quick fix on energy conservation, but helping immediately those in the worst fuel poverty. My Bill would have required minimum energy performance as a condition of registering HMOs. The Housing Bill does not include that provision, although I shall table an amendment on Report, and I hope that the Government will accept it. It was one of the most important motivations in wanting to license HMOs in the first place.

There are many other things that we are not doing. For example, 50 per cent. of our housing stock has solid walls, and we have no economic way of providing wall insulation. Do we invest any money in research and development into appropriate, affordable energy conservation measures for those walls? Not to the best of my knowledge—that was certainly true a year ago, when a director of the Building Research Establishment informed us that there was no investment in such research, even although it could yield an enormous dividend.

In the broader context of energy policy, the 20 per cent. saving of domestic energy by 2010, or of 5 million tonnes of carbon, is of the same order that we aspire to achieve by deploying renewable energy to 10 per cent. of our output by 2010. If we consider the situation in terms of bangs per buck, we will find that we would get a far quicker return from effective domestic energy provision than from deploying renewable energy. However, in reality, we need to do both and we need to do them effectively.

That is why I am saddened that the provision in my Bill enabling the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to require local authorities to deliver domestic energy conservation targets, which was carried into the Sustainable Energy Bill, has not been implemented. It may seem trivial, but some of the people most effective in promoting energy conservation—in advertising the Warm Front scheme and ensuring that it works—are our local authority home energy conservation officers, or however they are described locally. We happen to have an excellent officer in Brighton. I know the work that those people do, and with minimal investment they can produce good results. We are not using that power, which was inserted as an adjunct and as an extra delivery mechanism to ensure that things happen.

Our problem is partly cultural. It is endemic in government, irrespective of party. We have a "can't do" administration culture, for reasons that always seem important to the person saying that they cannot do something but, if considered in the broader context, are trivial and easily overcome. If we can convert our current culture of "can't do" or "It will wait; it doesn't really matter that much" into one of "can do" and "It can't afford to wait", we can make an impact. We can then get on with the business of saving the planet, preventing fuel poverty and leaving an inheritance to our grandchildren.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) on his sharply observed comments and his forensic analysis of the situation. I concur with everything he said.

There are clear reasons why we should do more in Parliament and as a country to promote energy efficiency. Most of those reasons have been touched on. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) quite properly referred to fuel poverty and the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner) referred to constituents huddled round one-bar fires. I have also seen such constituents, who have wind blowing in through inefficiently insulated windows, huddling round a fire unable to keep warm—and they have some of the higher fuel bills in my constituency. We must end that situation, which is unsatisfactory and unacceptable in the 21st century.

As my party's environment spokesman, I am predominantly concerned with climate change. As my hon. Friend mentioned, carbon dioxide emissions have increased in three years out of four. I am worried by what seems to be an underlying trend. With the switch from coal-fired to gas-fired generation, there was a one-off gain in the 1990s that led to significant reductions in carbon emissions. That has been banked and we are not seeing the further action necessary to reduce carbon emissions.

The Government have plans for renewable energy and they pay lip service to energy efficiency, but measures are not in place to meet the Government's reduction target of 20 per cent. by 2010, let alone the 60 per cent. target, which, as the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown said, may be insufficient in itself.

On fuel security, the Government quite rightly say that we must be certain of our fuel sources in years to come. We are at the end of gas pipelines that supply us from a very long way away. Many people want their bite out of the gas supply before it reaches us, and that will increasingly be the case in the future. The best way to enhance our fuel security in a very uncertain future is to minimise our demand for fuel in the first place by encouraging energy conservation and efficiency. That would be a very efficient way of ensuring security and it would of course benefit the energy efficiency industry, as my hon. Friend said.

Why is it such an uphill struggle to push energy efficiency? There seems to be cross-party, local council and public support for it, yet we must continually push and push to get measures implemented. There are two main reasons for that. First, there is a psychological reason: people, whether they are Ministers, MPs, officials, council leaders or whoever, like to build things. That is how they measure their achievement. They want to see a power station or a wind farm for which they have been responsible, so that they can point to it and say, "I did that." It is much less satisfying, psychologically, to say, "I cut energy use." One cannot really point to that. It is the same in the case of road transport: people like to build things. They are not so keen on road traffic reduction, which is far more important in some ways. We have to get over that mindset.

The second reason was referred to by several speakers this morning: the chronic failure of Government to deal with energy in a cohesive and comprehensive way in one Department. That issue is not confined to energy. It was also the case with animal welfare during the last Parliament. I drew attention to that regularly, and the Government, to be fair, have now largely sorted out that problem. All animal welfare issues are now dealt with by DEFRA, and policy is much more coherent as a consequence. We want the same sort of response on energy.

My party has proposed a change to the departmental structure that would bring together energy, transport and environment matters in a comprehensive way. That would lead to the sorts of changes and benefits that all of us in this Chamber want. At the moment, there is a split between DEFRA, the DTI, the Treasury, the ODPM and No. 10, which no doubt has a finger in there somewhere. As a consequence, we do not have joined-up government, and we get the sort of contradictory statements that my hon. Friend read out earlier.

Brian White: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that one of the reasons we were able to pass the Act was that we could play Departments off against each other? If the matter was dealt with by one Department, it would probably not be on the statue book.

Norman Baker: That is an interesting historical perspective, but I hope that it is not being advocated as a way to deal with energy policy. I would rather have one Department to nail down than a number of different Departments—with which such games can indeed be played.

As someone who shadows DEFRA, I say with absolutely no disrespect to the Minister or his DEFRA colleagues that it is deeply frustrating to be continually in debates where we have a real problem in Government with someone from DEFRA who is not actually responsible for creating the problem in the first place, and is unable to give a solution. The responsibility lies elsewhere, in the DTI, the Treasury or somewhere else in Government. It is a bit like complaining to the booking clerk at my local station that the train has been cancelled. He or she cannot do anything about it, and one should not complain to the clerk, but they are the only person one can complain to. The Minister is the only person we can complain to today.

One of the things that we have to do is give DEFRA a bit more clout. Poor old DEFRA: the DTI has the energy White Paper and the macho bit, with all the wind farms, and comments on nuclear power. Energy efficiency does not matter much, so it is given to DEFRA, which is one of the fundamental problems. With no disrespect to DEFRA and its Ministers, for whom I have a great deal of time, it would have been better to have a DTI or Treasury Minister here this morning. We could really get our teeth into them. I hope that the Minister will do his best to respond, and more importantly, take back the comments that have come from all three parties today to the DTI and the Treasury to ensure that they get the message. We want more Government action on this front.

I agree with the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown in the sense that whether we talk about a target or an aim is not terribly important in itself, but the Government tend to differentiate the meaning of such words, so it becomes important because of the way in which they respond to those words. When battles are lost, targets become aims, and when they are lost comprehensively, they become aspirations. We have found that in many aspects of Government activity.

There is a target to cut carbon emissions by 5 million tonnes by 2010. Will the Minister put it on the record, once and for all, with no equivocation, that that is the Government's target? Secondly, will he confirm that they have mechanisms to achieve that target, and spell out what those mechanisms are, so we can be confident that it will be achieved? That is what we want to hear from him today, and I hope that he will give those assurances.

Hon. Members have quite rightly referred to comments from industry. I want to refer to the comments from a number of pressure groups which, as the Minister will know, have written to the Government on the matter. The Campaign to Protect Rural England, Forum for the Future, Friends of the Earth, the Green Alliance, Greenpeace, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the WWF have sent a common statement to the Government. I would like to read out one paragraph:

"We express our view that it is of the utmost importance that the aim is, or includes, the achievement of 5MtC savings p.a. by 2010 from domestic energy efficiency. We say this because: unless this is set as a firm target the necessary measures to achieve it will not follow; this level of carbon savings is vital in order to ensure the achievement of the government's overall CO_2 reduction targets; if the aim does not include 5MtC savings p.a. by 2010 from domestic energy efficiency, the whole credibility of the recent Energy White Paper will be thrown into doubt."

There is a united front from pressure groups, from hon. Members of all parties in this Chamber, and from the public. We want to know what the problem is and when and how the Government will commit themselves unequivocally to achieving the target.

10.40 am

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) on securing this timely and important debate. I also recognise the contributions made by hon. Members from all parts of the Chamber. May I make a number of declarations? Clearly, I am not Britney Spears. In the short time available, my party was unable to secure her services, so the Chamber will have to make do with me this morning. I have modest interests in BP and Shell, and lived in a house with solar panels. Although time prevents me from commenting on the full scale of that disaster, I can say that I am not in a position to recommend their use without reservation. Perhaps we could explore that in a future debate.

I confess that I have sympathy with the Iddon policy of joined-up government, which I hope the Minister will also consider. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) mentioned a number of the Departments involved: housing is in the remit of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister; the Department of Trade and Industry is responsible for energy and played a major role in the Sustainable Energy Act 2003; and today, the DEFRA Minister, who is responsible for fisheries, is responding—more of that anon. It would be welcome if, as proposed by the Iddon policy, one lead Department in both Houses was responsible for energy policy.

It is fair to say that we would all subscribe to and be in favour of energy conservation measures, particularly in the home, just as we would favour motherhood and apple pie. The Government must address the question of how to achieve those aims: who will pay the price and what will the cost be? The average cost of a home in the Vale of York is £200,000. It is incumbent on the Government to set realistic targets, and it is clear from the debate that Government targets are elusive if not unrealistic.

In the early-day motion on greenhouse gas emissions, which several hon. Members present have signed, we recognised "that the industry and the environment and fuel poverty sectors have all stressed the importance of the aim being the achievement of five megatonnes of carbon savings per annum by 2010 from household energy efficiency as specified in the Energy White Paper".

I know that the Minister has a bad back, but he should not be allowed to wriggle out of answering the question: do the Government still subscribe to that aim or have they dropped it?

On behalf of the official Opposition, I record our bitter disappointment that the Government's environmental record is failing and that greenhouse gas emissions have consistently increased. The Government have done precious little: they set targets but either fail to meet them or remove them entirely. The Government's obsession with wind farms has entirely clouded their vision and precluded any other form of renewable energy. The Government have failed to support combined heat and power—only one serious operator remains, and they have not stated whether they will support that operator's plans to generate further combined heat and power. They are no nearer to reaching their target of more than doubling the amount of combined heat and power generation by 2010. That was set out as recently as 18 December 2003 in a written statement by the Minister for the Environment, and I record my disappointment at the situation.

Moreover, the Government have failed to eradicate fuel poverty, and energy suppliers have pushed up their prices. The Public Accounts Committee stated that the £500 million in grant spent on warm front—the Government's main initiative to eliminate fuel poverty among the most vulnerable—had failed to help those most in need. It said that only a third of grants had helped the fuel poor with low energy efficiency in their homes. We have heard a great deal about such situations in hon. Members' constituencies. A third of grants goes to households not living in fuel poverty, and a third of poorer households, which should benefit, have not been eligible for warm front grants.

Brian White: Is the hon. Lady seriously advocating that the grants should be removed from disabled people?

Miss McIntosh: Unfortunately, time does not allow me to elaborate on these points as I would like, but I shall pursue the point that the Government must accept that the grants have failed to reach the most vulnerable.

The Sustainable Energy Bill set the initial target of a 20 per cent. reduction in energy inefficiency by 2010. Can the Minister confirm that he will progress towards the main provisions of the Sustainable Energy Act 2003? If so, why have the Government delayed announcing their report under the Act and the White Paper until after Easter?

I shall dwell for a moment on a little book that was launched last week, which I am told will shortly reach the No. 1 spot on the bestsellers list—or at least it would if it were available for sale. It is the Liberal Democrats' little yellow book. In it, the Liberal Democrats come out as being even-handed: on the one hand they say one thing, and on the other they say another, both things being perfectly contradictory. The hon. Member for Hazel Grove used to be in favour of an energy tax, and page 21 of the little yellow book says that, in the alternative Budget of 8 March 2002, the Liberal Democrats called for the climate change levy to be replaced with "a carbon tax, which falls on energy use according to its carbon content".

In effect, that would be a tax on all energy users, and everyone's gas, coal and electricity bills would increase, which would hit the most vulnerable and those on fixed incomes particularly hard. The tax would be European Union-wide and might even be set by the European Commission.

The Liberal Democrats also advocate VAT on new house building. VAT would be levied at between 5 and 7 per cent. on new homes. I shudder to think of the impact on average house prices in my constituency. In the vale of York, the average home costs £200,000 and rising. I recommend the little yellow book, to which we shall return. I note that there has been no mention today of a carbon tax, so we shall wait to hear in future debates whether the Liberal Democrats have ditched that policy or will return to it.

Mr. Stunell: I am anxious to give the Minister time to respond to the debate and I do not want to enter a side argument, but I would be happy to give the hon. Lady a copy of the Liberal Democrats' energy policy paper passed at our conference last year. She will find it a complete answer to the questions that she has raised.

Miss McIntosh: Regrettably, time did not permit me to quote from the Liberal Democrat policies adopted last year, but we shall return to that.

We have had a very good, positive debate, and we now need commitments from the Government. What is their commitment to energy efficiency? Why has the announcement of the report under the Sustainable Energy Act 2003 and the White Paper been postponed until after Easter? Does the Minister still subscribe to producing 5 million tonnes of carbon savings per annum by 2010 by way of household efficiency savings, as set out in the energy White Paper? Has his or any other Department performed an audit to show how much carbon would be saved by the policy that we have discussed this morning?

I conclude with one positive point and a plea to the Minister. I hope that he will have more success with conserving energy than he has so far had with conserving fish.

10.50 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) on securing the debate and welcome the contributions made by him and other hon. Members. I apologise for the absence of my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment, who leads on energy in the House of Commons—as Lord Whitty does in the other place—as he is attending the United Nations global ministerial environment forum in South Korea.

The energy White Paper last year was a turning point for UK energy policy. For the first time, sustainability was put at the heart of this country's energy strategy. By announcing the goal of a 60 per cent. reduction in carbon dioxide emissions by about 2050, with real progress by 2020, the Government showed that they were serious about making a long-term transition to a low-carbon economy. Those goals built on what was already an ambitious goal to reduce carbon emissions by 20 per cent. by 2010.

Hon. Members have expressed disappointment about the figures released last week showing a rise in emissions last year. That was caused by a higher than expected coal burn by the power generators. The Government take that very seriously and will use the review of the climate change programme later this year to look at how their climate change policies are delivering across all sectors and where they need to be strengthened. However, it is worth reminding ourselves that this country, in contrast to most other countries that signed up to Kyoto, is on course to achieving its Kyoto commitments and is moving towards its national goals.

It is well known that there is the potential to improve energy efficiency by at least 30 per cent. across the economy. In the energy White Paper, the Government therefore identified energy efficiency as the major way in which we will meet our climate change goals in the short to medium term. Energy efficiency is expected to contribute more than half the total carbon savings to 2010 and in the following decade. We are talking about some 10 million tonnes of carbon savings by 2010 and a further 10 million by 2020. We expect about half of that to come from households.

The figure in the White Paper of 5 million tonnes, which has been cited today, was the Government's best estimate at that time of the savings that might be delivered by the policies and programmes set out in the climate change programme and further elaborated on in the energy White Paper. The figure was not presented as a target. The White Paper made it clear that the actual mix of measures needed in the future will be shaped by economic and technological developments.

Brian White: When we discussed the 2003 Act, one of the reasons why we talked about that figure was that it was equivalent to 20 per cent. That was specifically checked with officials at the time. That is why that figure was cited.

Mr. Bradshaw: I accept that, but the Government did not make a firm commitment to achieve specific levels of savings in any one sector. Hon. Members should also note that the figure of 5 million tonnes applies to the UK as a whole, whereas the aim required under the 2003 Act applies to England only. The equivalent figure for England would of course be lower.

Household energy efficiency has been improving steadily in recent years through the installation of central heating and improved insulation. Heat loss in the average dwelling was reduced by 31 per cent. between 1970 and 2001. During the 1990s, the average rate of efficiency improvement was around 1.4 per cent. a year, and that has increased further since then. However, I accept that we need to do better and we have a wide range of policies designed to achieve further substantial improvements.

The hon. Member for Hazel Grove suggested that the energy efficiency industry in this country was stalled. I simply do not accept that. The building regulations, for example, are steadily driving up the standards of new and refurbished homes. A house built to 2002 standards uses about half the energy consumed in the average existing house.

Miss McIntosh: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, I will not. The hon. Lady has made many diversions in this debate and has left me very little time to reply.

In the last amendment to the regulations, the provisions covering existing buildings were extended to include the replacement of windows and boilers in dwellings. I welcome the efforts of the hon. Member for Hazel Grove to widen the scope of the regulations further still through his Sustainable and Secure Buildings Bill, which the Government support.

In the White Paper, the Government said that they aim to bring the next major revision of the building regulations into effect in 2005—some three years earlier than previously signalled—and that will improve standards yet more. Of particular importance will be the provisions requiring the use of only the most efficient A and B-rated boilers, which will come into effect in April 2005. We have also started a major new training programme designed to equip 70,000 installers with the skills needed to install those boilers and to advise consumers on high-efficiency heating systems.

In response to the points made by the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), the sustainable buildings task group set up after the better buildings summit last year will make recommendations after Easter.

Through the energy efficiency commitment, energy suppliers are carrying out improvements to their customers' homes worth around £150 million a year. We will shortly be consulting on our proposal for the next phase of the energy efficiency commitment after 2005, and we expect those levels of activity roughly to double. Once high-efficiency boilers become mandatory under the building regulations next year, the main role of the commitment will be to promote the installation of insulation and high-efficiency appliances, and the EEC target will therefore provide a very firm signal to the industries concerned.

Our fuel poverty programmes, including the warm front grant scheme, will continue to support the installation of heating systems and insulation in the homes of the fuel poor. I hear the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) and I will reflect on his detailed and positive suggestions about how we might improve the warm front scheme. I will ask my noble Friend Lord Whitty to respond to him on the details.

My hon. Friend and other hon. Members also expressed concern about so-called silos in Government. Hon. Members constantly raise an issue about which they care deeply and wish that a single Minister was responsible. If we took on every single request, there would be hundreds of Ministers and hon. Members would not receive a better service. They fail to recognise that the Government are working through the new sustainable energy policy network, delivering joined-up government, and that all key Departments at ministerial and official level are involved.

The network is chaired by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and the Secretaries of State for all other Departments concerned are involved. As my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) said, there can be some advantages—I will not repeat the exact language that he used—in having different Departments with different priorities. One actually obtains a better deal than under the one that the Liberal Democrats are apparently advocating, in which we would have a single Minister responsible. That person would not be able to deliver what they were supposed to.

Several other programmes are furthering our energy efficiency aims: the decent homes programme, run by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister; the Energy Saving Trust, which is funded by my Department; we have recently announced a major new energy services pilot; and several fiscal instruments were added to in the recent Budget.

As hon. Members have acknowledged, the Government will shortly be publishing their energy efficiency implementation plan, which will set out comprehensive measures to deliver the energy efficiency strategy contained in the White Paper. My Department has been developing it through the sustainable energy policy network. We will be setting such an aim to fulfil the requirements of the Sustainable Energy Act and the White Paper. It is our current intention to include an aim for the household sector within the energy efficiency implementation plan, and for that aim to be consistent with the measures that the plan contains.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

11 am

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): May I first through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, thank the Speaker for allowing me to initiate this debate? I welcome the attendance of my old friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), and I am pleased that he will respond to this short debate.

In a conciliatory spirit, I put it to the Minister that there are many matters on which we agree, including the importance of improving safety on our roads. An analysis of the events in Madrid only a couple of weeks ago showed that as horrific, wrong and dreadful as that terrorist act was, the number of people who perished and the larger number who were maimed were not nearly as high as the number of people who die on roads in Spain or, for that matter, in this country. That is not to diminish that appalling terrorist atrocity, but it puts in perspective how much more we all have to do to ensure that our roads are safe and that casualty figures continue to fall.

Heavy goods vehicles represent about 1.4 per cent. of the traffic on our roads, yet they are involved in 15.5 per cent. of accidents that result in fatal casualties. I expect that, like me, hon. Members find those figures startling, but they get worse. Occupants of heavy goods vehicles represent 8 per cent. of the total casualties, whereas the occupants of vehicles that collide with a heavy goods vehicle account for 26 per cent. of casualties on our roads. It is therefore fair to say that anything that realistically can be done to improve the safety of heavy goods vehicles, such as my proposal to ensure that they are more conspicuous, would hugely benefit road safety and save lives.

I recall the days when there were no reflective number plates, and I am sure that the Minister does so too. In the days when we were both involved in Solihull politics, number plates were black and white. It was startling when reflective number plates were introduced in the late 1960s, largely by the 3M corporation, which has its UK headquarters in my Bracknell constituency. Hon. Members may recall a time when there was no reflective tape on the back of heavy goods vehicles, but now we all benefit from that at night. If we drive up behind a heavy goods vehicle that has broken down on a quiet road, our headlights pick it up much earlier than would otherwise be the case.

United Nations Economic Commission for Europe regulation 104 suggests that reflective tape should be put on the sides of heavy goods vehicles. A significant number of accidents occur at night or in bad weather conditions, when drivers simply fail to spot the heavy goods vehicles sideways on, with the consequent accident and casualties that I mentioned earlier. For reasons that are not entirely apparent from my correspondence with the Minister, the Government have chosen not to implement regulation 104, although it has been implemented in Italy. A similar regulation has been implemented in Russia and America, where it has led to a 17 per cent. reduction in casualties and accidents involving heavy goods vehicles. The prize is therefore huge, and many far-sighted companies, such as Marks and Spencer, Sainsbury's and the John Lewis Partnership, have voluntarily added reflective tape to their vehicles. That is marvellous, but we cannot rely on community-spirited companies. We should move towards all heavy goods vehicles having retro-reflective tape on the sides of their vehicles.

I have corresponded with the Minister in an attempt to persuade him of the need for such a provision. In his reply of 28 November 2003 last year, he was good enough to say:

"We are aware of the conspicuity benefits of retro-reflective tape, which can be used to outline the shape of large vehicles, using red to the rear and yellow to the side."

I am pleased that he recognises the strength of the case, but he went on to say that as regulation 104

"does not mandate the fitment of that tape to vehicles" the Government have decided that at this stage they do not want to implement it in our country, which is a great pity. The Minister referred to a Loughborough university research and cost benefit study which states that

"mandating retro-reflective side and rear markings on new heavy goods vehicles in the UK would" cost

"£12 million, while the expected benefits would amount to £6 million."

That was worrying, and sent a shiver down my spine. I am not sure how the Minister can place a value on dead and maimed people, but I should have thought that the price of saving so many lives was well worth paying.

I am by nature a deregulator rather than a regulator, so there must be special circumstances for me to call for additional regulation. I need, for example, to be satisfied that the cost is not disproportionate. The cost of putting tape along the sides of an average heavy goods vehicle is £100, which might be a lot of money to you and me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if we were fitting tape on our own cars, but as the cost of a heavy goods vehicle costs is approximately £100,000 it is hardly a major financial burden on hauliers and companies with such vehicles. There is no reason whatever for not implementing the regulation.

In his letter, the Minister said:

"We are aware that the Italian government have proposed to mandate the fitment of ECE R104 retro-reflective tape to heavy goods vehicles registered in Italy. At the moment there is some doubt as to whether they have the legal powers to do this. Vehicle lighting and signalling equipment on new vehicles is harmonised throughout Europe and currently R104 tape is 'optional' under type approval: thus it is at the vehicle manufacturer's discretion whether or not to fit it. National governments cannot impose extra requirements on a vehicle which has been correctly type approved."

The Minister is nodding, but I am not sure that the rest of us buy that argument. The implication is that vehicle manufacturers alone can fit retro-reflective tape, and that if regulation 104 were made mandatory here it would be their responsibility to ensure that compliant materials were fitted before delivery. That is incorrect. Retro-reflective tape is easy to fit and can normally be done by end users themselves, as is the case with the companies that fit it voluntarily.

The Minister went on to say:

"Vehicle lighting and signalling equipment on new vehicles is harmonised throughout Europe".

Consequently, neither Italy nor the UK could act unilaterally. That is questionable, to say the least, as there are already instances where the UK imposes stricter provisions on safety markings for domestically registered vehicles while still complying with EU and UN type approval legislation. It is the responsibility of the end user, rather than the manufacturer, to ensure that additional provisions are met, because there is a distinction between type approval and domestic vehicle requirements. The Minister will be well aware of that distinction.

A pertinent example is "Long Vehicle" marker boards, as described in UNECE regulation 70. The boards are mandatory for vehicles registered in the UK, but not in other EU countries such as Germany. The vehicle type, for example, a particular type of Volvo truck, is approved under the appropriate regulations, but the UK imposes an additional requirement before an end user can register the vehicle in the UK. That seems perfectly reasonable, and a similar arrangement could apply to retro-reflective tape. I put it to the Minister that, happily, a precedent has already been set.

If regulation 104 were made mandatory in the UK the vehicle type would be approved in the same way, but to register such a vehicle the end user would have to ensure that it was fitted with the appropriate retro-reflective material. As I have already mentioned, that would cost no more than £100 a vehicle. Such an initiative would not prevent vehicles from other countries from being allowed on UK roads, and would not contravene any EU trade legislation, so there is no good reason why we should not proceed.

Occasionally, the Minister and I gently clash about the issue of speed cameras in parliamentary questions. Far more lives would be saved by introducing a measure on retro-reflective tape than by siting speed cameras in the wrong place, such as, I strongly believe, the Heathrow airport exit. I would be out of order if I pursued that argument very much further so, as the Minister firmly believes in road safety, I urge him to implement regulation 104 as soon as possible. That is in everybody's best interests, and people who own and operate heavy goods vehicles have nothing to fear from the regulation.

11.13 am

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): With the approval of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay) and the Minister, I should like to make a brief contribution. I am at fault for not tackling the problem, because 18 years ago, I proposed a regulation to fit sidelights on vehicles. That regulation could have dealt with the problem of the visibility of long heavy goods vehicle when crossing the path of approaching traffic.

My right hon. Friend has made the case for fitting reflective tape to the sides of vehicles. I expect that the Minister will say that to make that mandatory straight away would not be the best way to make progress. If the initiative is to be of value, it should be taken up with the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe and made a Europe-wide proposal. I hope that today's debate will stimulate every operator of new and old vehicles to put yellow reflective tape on the sides of their vehicles and red tape on the back. That would represent progress, and I wish the Minister well in trying to get international agreement on introducing the measure as a mandatory Europe-wide provision.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): First, I congratulate the right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay) on securing this important debate, and I agree with the general thrust of what he and the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) said. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the fact that we are old friends who go back a long time; I first debated with him nearly 40 years ago. I always used to win those debates and I shall be equally convincing today, so I hope that he will not be too disappointed.

The right hon. Gentleman said that he is a keen deregulator, but I will avoid making the obvious joke—this is an example of him trying to increase the use of red tape. However, I am grateful to him for raising some important points on the use of retro-reflective tape on heavy goods vehicles to make them more conspicuous. I listened carefully to his arguments and I have re-examined our correspondence on the matter. We are in agreement on heavy vehicle safety. The Government take that matter seriously—it is an important part of our road safety strategy.

The right hon. Gentleman knows that road safety is extremely important to me and to my Department, as it has been to many other Ministers over a great number of years. We are making good progress on our road safety strategy, as set out first in "Tomorrow's roads—safer for everyone", which contains casualty reduction targets to be achieved by 2010.

Total deaths and serious injuries were down 17 per cent. in 2002, which is nearly halfway to our 40 per cent. target. Child deaths and serious injuries were down 33 per cent. in 2002, which is two thirds of the 50 per cent. target for 2010. However, that is no reason for complacency, even though those figures probably rank with the best in the world. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned several other countries, including Italy, Spain and Russia, which have substantially worse road safety records than we do.

The number of accidents involving heavy goods vehicles is high, but that too is falling. In 2002, 13,480 heavy goods vehicles were involved in injury accidents compared with 14,417 in 1993. That is a 6 per cent. fall in injury accidents over 10 years during which heavy goods vehicle traffic increased by 16 per cent. The rate of casualties related to heavy goods vehicles is falling dramatically, as it is in other areas of road transport. In the five years from 1997 to 2002, the numbers killed and seriously injured in accidents at night involving heavy goods vehicles also fell by 15 per cent. However, that is no reason for complacency, although things are clearly going in the right direction.

We have taken a number of other measures, such as extending the requirement for anti-lock braking systems to all vehicles and trailers over 3.5 tonnes. We have also introduced regulations making front under-run guards for new heavy goods vehicles compulsory, in addition to the safety guards already fitted to the sides and rear of heavy vehicles and trailers.

[Mr. David Jamieson]

We have also been putting considerable effort and money into helping the road haulage industry to train the people that it needs to meet its requirements. About £8 million from the road haulage modernisation fund has been invested in training to help the industry to meet its future labour and skills needs.

Turning to the specific issues, the right hon. Gentleman raised some good points. I hope to be able to put my response in a context that may bring some comfort to him in the long term, although perhaps not in the short to medium term. I share the concerns that he raised about the conspicuity of large vehicles. He will know that, since 1973, retro-reflective long vehicle marker plates have been required on all new vehicles over 7,500 kg and trailers over 3,500 kg.

From 1991, vehicles more than 6 m long have had to have side marker lamps and side retro reflectors to make them more conspicuous from the side, and end outline marker lamps to show the height and width of the vehicle from behind. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned measures taken in the United States, where there has been a 17 per cent. reduction in casualties and accidents involving heavy goods vehicles. Some measures taken by the UK did not prevail in the United States; our vehicles were more conspicuous because of measures other than the use of tape.

When the new standard for retro-reflective tape was developed, we recognised that its use might offer further road safety benefits. In 1997, the Department commissioned research to establish how best to use retro- reflective and fluorescent materials on large vehicles. In particular, the research considered tape conforming to regulation 104, a specification for reflective tape agreed in the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe, which regulates the technical requirements of vehicles. The regulation controls the physical properties of the tape—qualities such as its colour, how much light it reflects, dimensions, resistance to external agents and so on. It also contains guidelines on how the tape should be mounted on the vehicle, outlining its shape.

The Department's research on retro-reflective tape was one element of a larger project involving motor vehicle and pedal cycle conspicuity, which was carried out by the Ergonomics and Safety Research Institute at Loughborough university. The research showed that some accidents are due to the low conspicuity of vehicles or the poor perception of drivers as they approach a large vehicle, which retro-reflective tapes can improve by increasing the luminance contrast at night. However, fluorescent materials are more appropriate during the day.

The cost-benefit analysis prepared as part of the overall assessment showed that the estimated annual cost to the haulage industry of marking new heavy goods vehicles would be about £12 million, which was set against estimated savings of about £6 million. All deaths and injuries are important and we must concentrate our energy and resources on the best means of reducing casualties, focusing our finite resources where they will have the most impact. The report is available in the Library.

Our research was completed in 1998, so there are good arguments for re-doing the cost-benefit analysis and I agree that there is scope to do so. However, improving the visibility of heavy duty vehicles is included the European road safety action programme. The European Commission is carrying out research on the effectiveness of retro-reflective material, which will take about a year. Its research includes an assessment of costs and benefits, so it makes more sense to wait for the results before deciding whether we need to do anything more.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the Italian proposal to require vehicles and trailers over 3.5 tonnes registered in Italy to be fitted with tape on the rear and the sides. It is part of a package of measures that the Italian Government are considering to tackle Italy's road casualty problems. That country already has requirements for heavy vehicles similar to those in the UK, but Italy has a much higher accident rate and I can understand why its Ministers want to take action.

To illustrate the scale of the problem, there were 11.1 road deaths per 100,000 of the population in Italy in 2000 whereas in the United Kingdom the figure was 6.1 per 100,000. That is a substantial number less. Total road deaths in Italy in 2000 were 6,410 and in the UK the figure was 3,598, so road casualty levels in this country are much lower than in Italy, probably even for heavier vehicle usage. While Italy has strong reasons for wishing to take this action, there is some doubt as to whether it can do so unilaterally.

Since I wrote my letter to the right hon. Gentleman in June 2003, the UNECE position has changed. It did so as recently as 28 February and it is now an optional provision for type approval. A member state cannot refuse to register a vehicle that has type approval in another EU state. Member states cannot unilaterally mandate that, as it could constitute a barrier to trade. There has been some confusion about that, but it has been cleared up by the European Commission. If the right hon. Gentleman wants more information on that and some detail, I am happy to correspond with him.

I have been asked how we can have mandated for so many years that marker boards be fitted on the rear of trucks but cannot now unilaterally mandate on retro-reflective tape. It might help the House's understanding if I explain that the rules are different. This is a complicated topic, but I will do my best to give an outline of why we can include one requirement in our national law but not the other.

The situation hinges on Economic Commission for Europe regulation 48, which concerns the installation of lights and signalling devices. That has been changed in the last month or so to include an optional provision for reflective tape. It makes no mention of the marker boards. They are covered by ECE regulation 70. The subtle difference in those regulations permits national Governments to set their own requirements. That is what we do in the United Kingdom. I believe that most other member states take the same position.

Germany recently made a proposal to the UNECE working group on vehicle lighting to allow countries to make the fitting of regulation 104 tape mandatory for type approval of new heavy goods vehicles weighing more than 12 tonnes. That would mean manufacturers having to fit the vehicles with a tape to be allowed to sell them in those countries. It makes sense for Germany to make that proposal, as it does not apply the regulation for rear marker boards. Clearly it has much to gain from requiring conspicuity markings to the rear of heavy vehicles, but it starts from a lower baseline than we do, so the safety case is easier for it to justify.

We will consider the new UNECE proposals carefully and examine how they will affect our vehicle manufacture and haulage industries. As well as questions on the safety benefit, there are practical concerns, such as the difficulty with mounting the tape on unusually shaped vehicles without flat surfaces—for example, petrol tankers, cement mixers, cranes and car transporters.

So, as I am sure the House appreciates, we need to discuss the German proposal with United Kingdom stakeholders before we decide whether to support it. However, I assure to the right hon. Gentleman that, if we feel that that could bring genuine road safety benefits, of course it will have our full support.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the cost of fitting the retro-reflective tape. My Department's research shows that the cost is about £150 for materials, but there is a further cost for fitting. We have had representations from the industry—for example, the Freight Transport Association and the Road Haulage Association; he probably knows the latter. Returning again to Solihull, his old pal Roger King may have a different view from the right hon. Gentleman. He may want to catch up with an old pal and have a discussion, perhaps over a little noggin somewhere, to see whether he can come to an accommodation with him as well.

This has been a useful debate on an important subject. If there is any matter that I have not covered in full, I shall, as always, be most pleased to correspond with the right hon. Gentleman.

UK Olympic Bid (2012)

2 pm

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West) (Lab): I want to speak about the bid to bring the 2012 Olympics to the United Kingdom. A lot has been said in this place and in the main Chamber about the bid, and that is quite right, because it is of great significance in itself. If successful, it will have implications that will keep this place and the main Chamber busy for many hours from now until 2012 and, no doubt, beyond. I have read previous speeches on the subject and will endeavour to avoid repeating points that have already been raised.

I believe that if the state is to commit itself to hosting an event such as the Olympic games, it must do so on the basis that all parts of the UK must benefit, directly or indirectly. The games must, of course, be held substantially in one place, although some events can be dispersed. Rowing, for example, will be held at the world-class Eton Dorney facility, and football will be held across the UK, including in Glasgow and Cardiff. Much of the benefit will, of course, come to the London area, but it is important to note that there will be significant spin-offs across the UK for tourism, building contracts, extensions to building contracts and the whole chain that relates to the games.

I want mainly to talk today about the sports communities—not just in competitive sport, but those existing in all communities—that would benefit considerably from a successful bid, providing that those responsible for managing it proceed with sensitivity to the need to spread the benefits as widely as possible. I am glad to hear from London 2012 Ltd., the company responsible for putting the bid together, that such sensitivity to the reliance of the bid on taxpayers across the whole UK is to the fore in its mind.

Mr. Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept, in the nicest possible way, that the title for this debate is technically a misnomer, because the bid is in the name of London and the British Olympic Association and not the United Kingdom? Does he agree that, in order to obtain the support of the whole UK, the British Olympic Association and the Government should had followed the practice of other countries of opening the nominations for the British competitor city to the whole UK? Not having done that has divided the country in many ways, because people think that something given to London, without allowing other cities to compete, is unfair.

Mr. Joyce: I recognise entirely what my hon. Friend says: he is extremely knowledgeable on the subject. My understanding—I shall say more about this later— is that the criteria drawn up by the International Olympic Committee are such that London is the only city in the UK that is likely to succeed. Although I recognise that other hon. Members whose constituencies are in large cities would naturally want to argue for their cities, I must recognise that Falkirk is unlikely to be a successful bidder for the 2012 Olympics. That is a harsh fact of life, and I must resign myself to it.

Mr. Tony Banks (West Ham) (Lab): May I confirm what my hon. Friend has just said? The IOC made it clear that the only bid city from this country that it would entertain was London. Manchester and Birmingham have tried unsuccessfully before, and the BOA made it clear it would only put forward a London bid. It is not a bias towards the metropolis; it is a fact of life that the IOC would only entertain a London bid, and we must accept that.

Mr. Joyce: I agree: it is simply a fact of life and we must proceed from that position. That is where we find ourselves now; sadly, the Falkirk Olympics remain on the theoretical books—

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): On hold.

Mr. Joyce: On hold, for a little longer, until we expand the town.

The bid team is establishing a nations and regions support group, which will meet for the first time this May. That is an important development.

Mr. Stringer: As ever, I have been listening carefully to my hon. Friend and following the logic of his argument. However, he should consider the cities that have hosted the Olympic games since the second world war, the slight majority of which have not been capital cities. Furthermore, I have never found an official statement from the International Olympic Committee saying that it will accept a bid only from London. He said that there will be many debates on the subject, so will he bring us that categorical statement of IOC policy either today or in another debate?

Mr. Joyce: I cannot bring that categorical statement. I proceed from the assumption that the bid is being made in the name of London, and that is just the way it is. The evidence may be given in future debates, and I strongly suspect that that will happen, but it is not something that I can do today.

Each nation and region will nominate someone from the business world and another from the sporting world to represent it on the support group. The group will be chaired by Charles Allen, who is the vice-chair of London 2012 Ltd. and one of this country's leading business people. The group will advise on how best to link the bid to regional businesses and sports networks, and it will create a new platform to develop the ways in which the UK as a whole can benefit from bringing the games to London. That will include exploring opportunities for commercial contracts, for locations such as universities to benefit by providing bases for pre-Olympic training camps and for venues to attract major sporting events in the run-up to the games.

As far as I can see from its remit, the nations and regions support group will not consider the knock-on effects of the games, but some benefits will accrue. A successful bid will lead to world-class facilities, which we could reasonably expect many sports to take advantage of for years to come. In addition, a successful bid may assist Glasgow's chances of staging the 2014 Commonwealth games, in which the city has declared its interest. Its councillors are meeting today with a view to developing the bid. Not that anyone would want it, but even an unsuccessful Olympics bid could bring advantages. Manchester's unsuccessful bid for the Olympics led to an enormously successful Manchester Commonwealth games, and similarly, if the council decides to go ahead, a Glasgow bid for the 2014 Commonwealth games could benefit.

I understand the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer), but if not in name, the bid is effectively by the UK as a whole—it is a Great Britain and Northern Ireland bid.

Chris Bryant: One difficulty with the legacy is that it will all be in London, although there may be earlier benefits elsewhere. Another point is that the IOC has a habit of making exaggerated demands on countries that hold the Olympics. For instance, Athens has been told that it must have a legacy stadium of 10,000 seats for baseball and basketball, two games that are hardly played in Greece.

Mr. Joyce: That is interesting, as I was not aware of that. However, I cannot quibble with the criteria laid down by the IOC because I do not know enough about the detail. It is inevitable that a substantial proportion—if not the majority—of the economic, developmental and regenerational benefit will accrue to the largest conurbation in the country. That is a fact of life. If we want to bring the Olympics to the UK, there are some things that go without saying, and that is why it is important that we spread whatever benefits as widely as we can. I suspect that there will be upgrades to sporting facilities such as football stadiums, and we must consider that they will be of significant benefit to the communities affected.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Places such as Loughborough university will benefit from the location of one of the major sporting teams because of the facilities that we already have and the extra income that will be generated. Some of the facilities will need upgrading by then, and the legacy will not be coincidental: it will flow from ensuring that places outside London play their part. Many of my constituents will be very interested in volunteering, and I hope that my hon. Friend will address that as well.

Mr. Joyce: Indeed. I will come to that in due course. My hon. Friend is taking most of my speech away, so I will not reply to him immediately or I will run out of words and deliver it in the wrong order. He is right: there are many ways in which the rest of the country can benefit. Those of us who represent constituencies outside London must consider ways in which we will benefit, rather than concentrate too much on the fact that the largest conurbation will be a significant beneficiary.

The Government and the British Olympic Association made it clear that the criteria set by the IOC mean that London is the only city that could be a successful British bidder. Even then, we know from coverage of the subject in the press and elsewhere that competition will be very fierce.

Political, business and sporting leaders from across the UK have been vocal in their support of the London bid. Scotland's First Minister, Jack McConnell, has confirmed his support for the 2012 bid. In doing so, he noted that Scotland would benefit in many ways from a successful bid.

The bid may attract additional tourists who would be likely to attend part of the Olympics and take in some other part of the UK while they are here. They could do no better than to visit the Falkirk wheel, one of Scotland's most visited and excellent tourist attractions. It is increasingly the reason why many people visit Scotland, and by remarkably good fortune, it happens to be in the middle of my constituency. It has been suggested that the high diving could take place from the top, which is 130 ft high, but I suspect that the canal at the bottom is too shallow for that.

In confirming his support for the Olympic bid, the First Minister also drew attention to the first-rate facilities that already exist in Scotland, to which my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Mr. Banks) has already alluded. Those facilities include the swimming centre of excellence at Stirling university. It is not in my constituency, but it is only 20 minutes away and a place of work and study for many of my constituents. Other facilities include the national rowing academy recently opened at Strathclyde Park. They could readily be used as pre-Olympic training camps.

Scotland would of course host Olympic football events. I realise that Members may wish to challenge this point, but it would seem odd if Scotland were to host an Olympic football event and there was no UK team involved. It is a contentious issue, and the Scottish Football Association, the Football Association and the British Olympic Association have proposed various ways round it: one would be that the winners of a home international represent Britain. I am not sure about that. Another would be a select UK team. There are several ways of dealing with it, but it would be peculiar not to have a UK team. That is not to force the idea on the FA and the SFA, however, because I believe that the last time it happened was 1960.

Chris Bryant: As a Welshman representing a Welsh seat, I wholly concur with the view that there should be a UK football team. I am sure that there will be a football match in the millennium stadium, which is a fine stadium—probably the best in the land. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that we should go in that direction rather than in the direction that some wild, woolly nationalists have argued, namely that we should have separate Welsh, Scottish and English teams for athletics, cycling, swimming and everything else.

Mr. Banks: The IOC would never accept that.

Mr. Joyce: I agree entirely. There are separate football associations and identities for international football, but that would not be acceptable to the IOC.

Scotland, much like other parts of the United Kingdom, has a proud history of welcoming visitors from around the world with warmth and friendliness and I am confident that athletes and spectators from participating Olympic countries would find Scotland an excellent place for preparation and tourism. Politicians in Westminster and in Scotland have expressed Scotland's desire to welcome athletes, although we recognise that it would be a matter of competing with locations not simply in England but in sunny places such as the south of France where African athletes might find it more pleasant to be in the run-up to the games. Nevertheless, we have the facilities and we must ensure that that is on the record.

I want to mention the effect of a successful Olympic bid on sport in and around my constituency, which is in Scotland's central belt. I am aware that many issues concerning sport are devolved to the Scottish Executive and that anything concerning the national lottery is, theoretically, reserved. There is a danger of getting into a mire if I go into too much technical detail about particular sports, but sport is as much a part of Scottish national life as it is a part of Welsh national life and, I am sure, of English and Irish national life. It is fair to flag up the importance that sport plays in Scotland as well as the rest of the UK.

In many respects, the important impact of sport in our constituencies comes from the community effect, not from the high-level competing. Many people in our constituencies take part in sport daily and look to the highest level of performance for their inspiration. Many Olympic sports are essentially community sports.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will start to discuss how the Olympics will be financed, which will be from lotteries. Does he share Scotland's concern that its slice of £41.8 million to pay for the London Olympics will set back the regeneration of sport in Scotland by 20 years?

Mr. Joyce: I shall come to funding presently, although I realise that time is ticking on. The hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to hear that I do not agree with him, but I do not necessarily disagree with all that Sport Scotland says, and I recognise that there will be a burden on taxpayers. I shall try to respond to his comment in context, if I may.

Community sports that are also Olympic sports include gymnastics, judo, hockey and basketball, and one can find people taking part in those sports in sports halls in our constituencies on any night of the week.

I shall speak about judo, which has a noble history in the Olympics. In Scotland, it is run under the auspices of Sport Scotland, but it is a BOA sport and ties in with the British Judo Association. In fact, it delivered one third of all the medals that Scotland won in the last Commonwealth games. Scotland and the UK are becoming very successful in that sport, and its main base is its many community clubs throughout the UK.

In Scotland, there are 110 judo clubs, and the 10,000 members, the majority of whom are children, and their parents, keep the sport alive. Volunteers usually work for nothing, and the officials who run judo organisations usually do so for very modest reimbursement. As young people grow older, there is a trend for them to be attracted away from their particular sport, and from sport in general, by more sedentary activities. That is a pity for national life, and one of the benefits of holding the Olympic games in the UK is that the exciting, flashy side of sports, which may rarely be seen, is brought into their own backyard. That will encourage people to stay in sport, particularly in my sport, in which there is a serious drop-off rate before people reach early adulthood.

[Mr. Joyce]

More countries are members of the International Judo Federation than of the United Nations. That should remind us of the effect that sport has in connecting people from different countries and communities. It makes people in our constituencies, who might not normally think about international issues, more aware of what is going on around the world. That is another reason why community sports should be at the forefront of our minds.

Sport Scotland, in common with its regional counterparts in the UK, has said, as the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) said, that an Olympic bid could draw resources away from other areas of sport in Scotland—the Minister may wish to respond to that. I think that, in return for the benefits to the UK and to Scotland of holding the Olympics in Britain, we should all take an element of the risk and cost. All sports would benefit, to the extent that it justifies their taking an element of the risk that will be largely borne south of the border.

Pete Wishart: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman. Surely, with an ever dwindling pot, the money should fund community resources, proper sporting tuition and a community infrastructure so that young people participate in sports, especially given the lifestyle and obesity problems in Scotland. That money should not go into infrastructure projects in London. The Olympics may make people interested in sport, but would the money not be better spent on community resources?

Mr. Joyce: I think that the hon. Gentleman has a particular agenda—his raison d'être is to stress the importance of independence and separation and he thinks that decisions on funding should be made on that basis. I think he finds it difficult to swallow not that the Olympics might be staged south of the border—he probably views that in the same way as if they were staged in Paris or elsewhere—but that many athletes will compete with enormous pride wearing a Great Britain and Northern Ireland vest, shirt or swimsuit, and that millions of people, north and south of the border, will proudly support them. I think that it sticks in the craw of Scottish and Welsh nationalists that people are enormously proud to be British on these occasions. That is a fact of life, and all is can say to him is that he might be happier if he switched political parties.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): Is not the answer to the concern of the hon. Member for North Tayside that however much additional funding we would all welcome for community sport, it is largely run by volunteers? As a result of holding the Olympics in this country, the enthusiasm, interest and participation of young people in those community sports activities will be massively boosted. That will help to tackle the obesity problem that he referred to.

Mr. Joyce: I could not agree more with the hon. Gentleman's wise words.

The UK is undoubtedly the spiritual home of the Paralympics, which are a wondrous display of physical and mental determination in sport, and we probably say too little about them in debates such as this. Although the UK is a leader in the development and promotion of sport for the differently abled and in the medals haul, holding the games will lead to UK Paralympic athletes garnering a larger than usual haul of medals—there is evidence that holding the Olympics leads to winning more medals. It will also provide additional inspiration to those of differing abilities, who sometimes feel that participating in sport is beyond them. In short, I believe that the UK and its Paralympic athletes deserve the opportunity to showcase the advancement of Paralympic sport in 2012.

I shall conclude by repeating my key points for my right hon. Friend the Minister, and I hope that she can respond to them in her winding-up speech. I want to be confident that the bid team and the Government are making a major effort to ensure that the benefits are, wherever possible—we must recognise that there are limits—spread throughout the UK and our community sports. I would also like the Minister to comment on university sport, which I have not mentioned, but which feeds into the mainstream and is sometimes a little underfunded. We have heard of marvellous facilities at Loughborough, Stirling, Bath and Sheffield, but in other parts of the country, university sport is not always as well funded as it might be. I also stress the role of the Paralympics, which are sometimes a bit of a Cinderella issue in these debates.

2.26 pm

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): I congratulate the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce) on securing what I think is the third debate in as many months on what I will refer to as the London Olympic bid, which is a much more appropriate description. I have managed to speak in most of the debates, although I concede that my contribution has not been the most popular or well received one. That is probably because I have been prepared to challenge the cosy consensus that suggests that a London Olympics will be good for London and for the rest of the United Kingdom. That contention is at least challengeable. The Olympic bid will be good for London because—

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): As the hon. Gentleman says, those of us who are fans of sport are used to his relentlessly negative comments on behalf of his party. May I put a challenge to him? If another Olympic country suddenly announced that it wanted to use his constituency of North Tayside as its training base, would he suddenly appear in all his local newspapers saying that he had always been in favour of the 2012 Olympic bid?

Pete Wishart: If any Olympic country were prepared to come to Pitlochry, Dunkeld or Forfar, I would be delighted to answer the hon. Gentleman's question, but that is not the point that I have been consistently trying to make in these debates, as he will appreciate.

I have been prepared to challenge the cosy assumption that a London Olympics will be good for London and for the rest of the UK. We know that the Olympics will be good for London, because the Government commissioned the engineering consultants Arup to consider the issue. The benefits for London will be substantial and significant. I do not know what the impact will be on the rest of the UK but, when I assess the losses and gains on the balance sheet, I see more losses than gains.

It would take more than the first round of an unlamented football competition and the possible use of some of our facilities by international teams to convince me otherwise, because the loss is quite significant and quite tangible. It is all about the way in which it is proposed to pay for a London Olympic games. They will be paid for with £1.5 billion of lottery funding, but lottery funding is for the good causes, charities and grass-roots sports in each and every one of our constituencies. That is an unacceptable way to pay for a London Olympics.

I feel vindicated in questioning that approach, because I have read the interesting report by the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport that comes to the same conclusion. In fact, it goes further than I have ever gone in a speech about a London Olympics. It states:

"We regard the £1.5 billion earmarked by the Government as the Lottery's overall contribution to the Olympics as a straightforward raid."

Chris Bryant: As a member of the Select Committee, I should perhaps explain exactly what we meant by that statement. We are earnest supporters of the Olympic bid, but many of us would like the country to pay through taxation rather than the lottery. That does not mean, however, that we believe that Britain should not be saying yes to a London bid.

Pete Wishart: I appreciate that that is the sentiment of the Select Committee, but a straightforward raid is a straightforward raid. I hope that the Minister listened to the hon. Gentleman's intervention, because what he mentioned would be a much more appropriate way to pay for the Olympics. It is unacceptable that the good causes, charities and grass-roots sports in my constituency should pay for infrastructure projects in central London.

The Select Committee's report is very interesting, balanced and rounded, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) on being a member of it. It is worth telling the hon. Member for Falkirk, West—this applies to his constituency as well as to mine—that the report states that "funding the 2012 Games, should the bid be successful, constitutes a potentially huge drain on the total funds available for the existing good causes, including grassroots sport (especially outside London where expected legacies will presumably be less)."

The games will have a greater impact on the far-flung nations, regions and constituencies than on constituencies closer to London.

The Select Committee is entirely right. Paying for the London Olympics out of the money that would ordinarily go to grass-roots sports, charities and other good causes is wrong in principle and contrary to what the lottery is supposed to be about. It is wrong for the nations and regions of the UK, which the Select Committee rightly identified as the biggest losers in this grand lottery raid.

For what reason will the lottery fund be raided? The odd football game in Glasgow. We are told that holding the Olympic games in London will create a massive incentive for people to become interested in sport, that all of a sudden they will get off their couches and get involved in sporting activities. How does that square with the speech of the hon. Member for Falkirk, West, who mentioned Sport Scotland's comment that, because of the way in which the Olympic games will be funded, the regeneration of sport in Scotland will be set back by 20 years? It is worth pointing out exactly what Sport Scotland said:

"If we lose over £40 million from lottery funds because of the London Olympics we'll need to end whole programmes which provide support to grass root and elite sport in Scotland ... There is a terrible irony in the fact that bringing the greatest sporting show on earth to the UK could devastate the regeneration of sport in Scotland and set us back 20 years."

We must take such comments seriously.

Mr. Reed: I have not been too disparaging of the hon. Gentleman's comments in the past. I have listened to the same speech on each of the three occasions that he has given it.

I support some of what the hon. Gentleman is saying, in that my support for the Olympics has always been on the basis of the least impact on grass-roots sport. However, does he accept that the games are not just about a two or three-week event? If we win in 2005, there will be a seven-year build-up to the games. If we were able to utilise all that energy and excitement, perhaps the lottery would generate even more money rather than less. There is a great deal of work to be done, but we should get behind the games and make them work in such a way that grass-roots sport across the United Kingdom, including in Scotland, is not affected.

Pete Wishart: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that useful intervention, because we must get this right. We cannot allow good causes such as charities and grass-roots sport to suffer, which Sport Scotland envisages will happen. Taking £41.8 million, as it currently stands, from good causes in Scotland is unacceptable. We must try to find alternatives and a means of dealing with the situation.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman is making a mountain out of this issue. In fact, much of the money that will, as he puts it, go from good causes to the Olympics will be spent before 2012 by the bid committee and the good causes on things that good causes might well have done anyway. Their projects will be realigned to work with the Olympics. Resources will not be directly taken away from them. In many cases, there will be an effort to bind everything in the sports strategy for the UK into the single bid for the Olympics.

Pete Wishart: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I hope that that is the case, but he should speak to the volunteer organisations in his own constituency or the national organisations in Wales, as I have. They have real fears and concerns about the impact on their lottery funding. They are looking for reassurances, which I hope the Minister will be able to provide.

The simple and obvious fact, regardless of what the hon. Gentleman says, is that it is inevitable that grass-roots projects will suffer if money is diverted from them to large infrastructure projects in London—we all accept that. We have heard the Government say that they accept that grass-roots projects will suffer, and our constituents are aware of that.

There are massive health and lifestyle problems in Scotland. Unfortunately, for much of the population, including children, obesity is increasing. Most of the people do not participate in any sporting activity. I do not believe that that will be addressed by a London Olympic games. It will be addressed only by facilities and proper sporting tuition, and by investing properly in our communities and by building the sporting infrastructure. We need investment in grass-roots sports projects, not in massive infrastructure projects in London.

Our team sports are in decline. We have nothing in the way of a youth academy with facilities. It will not have passed hon. Members by, but Scotland secured the wooden spoon in the Six Nations rugby on Saturday, such is the condition of team sports in Scotland. If a pot of money is available to be diverted, it should go to youth academies and grass-roots team sports to try to reverse that worrying trend.

I have a sensible solution to the matter, which will satisfy London Members and those from the more far-flung regions: as the wealthiest and most prosperous city in Europe, if London wants the Olympic Games it should pay for them. London will get all the benefits and legacies if its bid is successful. It will secure 3,000 jobs, the regeneration of east London, the £70 million benefit of the fiscal impact of growth in the local economy and the extra income generated by the growth in tourism, which it is estimated will be between £280 million and £507 million. London has wealth way beyond what those in the regions and the other nations in the United Kingdom can imagine, and good on London for that. But it must pay for the Olympics.

It is estimated that Scotland will lose £41.8 million from the national lottery's good causes if London succeeds in its bid to host the 2012 Olympics. That will inevitably lead to long-term damage to Scotland's charity work. A small amount of money in a small community makes a huge difference and a lot of good work can be done with £41 million in small grants. I do not know how much of a feel-good factor there will be if London gets the Olympic Games, but that amount would certainly help charity work in Scotland.

I hope that London will be successful in securing the games, but I do not want the good causes, charities and grass-roots sports in Scotland and the other nations and regions of the UK to pay for them. If London wants the Olympic Games, London should pay.

2.37 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (West Ham) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce) on securing not only this short debate but others, too. I trust that he does the lottery, as he is clearly a lucky sort of fellow.

The insular, negative approach of the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) was very depressing. When the curling team, which was effectively from Scotland, won the gold medal, the whole nation rejoiced; I did not complain about the lack of curling facilities in London or anywhere else, because that victory unified the whole country. It might be at the centre of his complaints that the Olympic games are such a unifying force, because that is not something that the Scottish National party welcomes. It is not just about London.

When the Minister winds up, she will no doubt tell us more about the costs. A successful Olympic games will make a profit, which will benefit sport throughout the country. The mere impetus to people who participate in sport will generate income down the line. Thanks to the Mayor's levy, Londoners will pay for the project for about seven years, so it is not the case that they will make no contribution.

An Olympic games, whether it succeeds or fails, will reflect on the whole country; there will be tangible benefits, not just for London. There will be sports events and training camps for Olympic teams from other nations around the country and an enormous amount will be spent on them. Athletes in the different disciplines from the four home countries will participate in the games; it will be an enormous boost for the country as a whole. London has to be the location, because a city has to be nominated. We must check whether an official statement has been made on the matter, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer). When I was Minister for Sport, it was made clear to me by the then president of the IOC, Juan Antonio Samaranch, that in no circumstances would a bid other than London's be acceptable to the IOC; the BOA has consistently said so, too. A proper statement on the issue would clear the air, because it is being used as a diversion. Manchester and Birmingham made brave efforts and failed quite badly in terms of the number of votes that they got from the IOC. I think that the entire country should close ranks behind the London bid.

I declare a constituency interest. The heart of the bid centres on my constituency. In the east end, we are delighted. I say to the hon. Member for North Tayside that London may be a wealthy city in its totality, but if he comes to the east end, I will show him levels of poverty, unemployment and deprivation that rival anything in Scotland or elsewhere. That is not the only reason to hold the Olympic games there, but it is an important spin-off. The regeneration of the east end of London in Stratford and the lower Lee valley would be of enormous benefit. I hear many Scots accents in my area, so it is not as though the jobs will go only to the English. Unfortunately, decrepitude alone will rule me out from being at the opening ceremony in 2012 as the Member of Parliament for West Ham, but in the meantime I will give the bid all my support.

I enter a small personal note. I realise that I am personally tainted by the failure of the 2006 World cup bid. We did our best. We had a great bid that was well organised. However, external factors determined that we were not to be successful. One of those, of course, was the gentlemen's agreement, of which we knew nothing when we set out on the bid or when the Tories launched it in 1996. The crowd violence at Charleroi and Brussels in Euro 2000 was the final nail in the coffin.

I say to Ministers that if we had been successful in that World cup football bid it would have been put down to the charisma and inspired leadership of Bobby Charlton, but because we failed we blame the politicians. That is the way it goes, and I hope that Ministers in the Department will take that as an object lesson. There is no fear of crowd violence at beach volleyball spoiling our bid for the 2012 Olympic games.

The trouble is that we live in a country where the blame culture reigns supreme. According to the press, when we attempt anything we are either the best in the known cosmos or we are the pits. There is no in between. This is a competition, and we must accept that, in a competition where there are so many cities going for it and giving it their best shot, we could lose. That does not mean to say that we are contemplating losing. We must give it our best shot, but of course there is a risk. The competition is fierce and there are a lot of obstacles to overcome. There will be setbacks during the process.

All bids go through those setbacks. Sydney did so last time and Athens is now going through the problems of putting in place the infrastructure and getting it all together. There are the added problems of terrorism and security needs. I do not suppose that Beijing will have many problems with construction. Anyone who can run tanks over their own people in Tiananmen square is not likely to be held up by a bunch of construction workers. However, we will run into difficulties, and one must always be aware that, at the time that we announced that we were going to go for anything, we found large numbers of fair-weather friends. We must ensure that we maintain the political will to overcome the obstacles and problems that we will, no doubt, encounter along the way.

We mentioned the question of legacy. We must ensure that there are legacies to the bid. I mentioned some of them, including how the country will be united and extra money will come into sport following a successful Olympic bid. In my own area, Stratford and the lower Lee valley, we need to know what will happen to that Olympic stadium. It can be put only to a football use. West Ham is a possibility, Tottenham Hotspur another and, judging by the ambitions of Mr. Abramovich, perhaps Chelsea might like to transfer to the east end. I am not sure how my constituents would view that proposal. I, of course, would be delighted.

My last point is about my early-day motion 786, which is about a British Olympic football team. That is a principle supported by the IOC and the BOA. Indeed, FIFA has made it clear that, were we to enter a Great Britain football team, that would not jeopardise our position with respect to the four home nations at FIFA. We can believe that if we want to—it is certainly the public statement.

I have been pushing the idea of a Great Britain team for many years—as a Minister, and before I was a Minister. The existence of four nations in the World Cup is not only a remnant of imperial arrogance—it is self-defeating. No other country would be mad enough to divide itself into four bits to make it easier for other countries to defeat it. I know that people will say that only English players would be in the team, but that is nonsense—it is a snapshot. I can think of a Great Britain team that would have had Greaves, Law and Best in it. We were never given the opportunity to see that.

I believe that the Olympic games would give us a chance to see how the country reacts to a Great Britain football team. It would introduce some of the Olympic spirit into our professional game, which would not be a bad thing. I hope that the Minister will give her support today to the principle of a British Olympic football team, although if she does I suggest she first buy a tin helmet.

2.46 pm

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I was not sure whether that was an intervention or a peroration; clearly the peroration defeated the intervention. I had not intended to speak this afternoon, but I was inspired when the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) intervened with his nationalist urge for us to dismember the United Kingdom yet again and to encourage an element of resentment against the bid on behalf of the capital city of the United Kingdom.

I have always been a supporter of the Olympic concept, ever since 1972 when, on holiday with my family in Spain, I was ill. I was not allowed to go out in the sun and I sat and watched every moment of the Olympic games and noted in a notebook every outcome—every runner's speed and each element of the results. That shows that I have an obsessive personality. I am obsessively supportive of the London bid, despite the fact that my constituency will not receive many direct benefits from it. I believe, nevertheless, that the indirect benefits will be substantial. For a start, it will provide to a significant extent the inspiration that we need in this country, encouraging more young people to see sport not just as something happening in a distant country, or something that other people do, but as something that people here pursue with phenomenal ability.

I should like every young person in the Rhondda to watch the television and see the Olympics in the UK, perhaps after a run-up to the games in which some of the athletes will have trained in south, west or north Wales. I should like those young people to have an opportunity to come into contact with them and to come to believe in the possibility that they could achieve as well as anyone else if they became involved in sport.

The Manchester Commonwealth games provided, to an extent, just such inspiration for sportspeople in the United Kingdom. There was a resurgence in certain sports. Rowing, cycling and swimming, in particular, have undergone a resurgence in the past few years that has fluctuated with the success of United Kingdom sportspeople in major international tournaments.

There will also, I believe, be significant tourism potential to be gained for the whole of the United Kingdom from holding the Olympics in London. It is a simple fact that London will fill up pretty quickly with tourists, even at that time of year. An important role for the London tourist board is as a gateway for the rest of the United Kingdom.

The National Assembly for Wales and the Scottish Parliament have spent quite a lot of money trying to market Scotland and Wales on the west coast of America and elsewhere. I think that that is a mistake. We should do better to market Britain, because it is only by flying to London airport that people will go to Cardiff, Ceredigion or other places in the United Kingdom.

I am reminded of the fact that when Charlotte Church sang before the recently elected George W. Bush he asked her where she was from; she said she was from

[Chris Bryant]

Wales and he said, "What state is that in?" She said, "Terrible." The likelihood of many people in the United States of America going to Wales is relatively minor, unless they understand that they are coming to the United Kingdom. That is why I believe passionately that this is a key opportunity for the British tourist organisations to ensure that they get the Olympic tourism issue right. People coming into London will see only a tiny part of Britain if they visit only London, Oxford and Stratford-upon-Avon. We need them to travel throughout the UK.

I am in favour of the Olympics coming to London for the simple reason that London will stage them phenomenally well. The opening and closing ceremonies in nearly all such events around the world are run by British people. We will probably do it better on our own home territory than anywhere else. I believe in the Olympic spirit. It is good for sport around the world and for international relations. That spirit was formed in the original Olympics in ancient Greece as an attempt to bind people together. I hope that Britain, through running the Olympics in 2012, will provide a similar stimulus, because we will do it better than any of the other countries.

One of the indirect benefits, which might become a direct benefit for every part of the country, will be the number of volunteers that it will take to run the Olympics in London. London alone will not be able to provide all the volunteers. What better opportunity could there be for a young person, whether they are from Edinburgh, Swansea, Newport or Stratford-upon-Avon, than to come to London and spend three weeks helping in a major international sporting event? They will be able to see major sporting heroes and heroines at close quarters. The experience of recent Olympics—we are already seeing this happening in Athens—is that those volunteers are often the next generation of sporting heroes and heroines. I hope that we shall see that happen in the event of a successful London bid.

Pete Wishart: I agree with most of what the hon. Gentleman says, but I hope that he will deal with the key issue of funding. Given that he has spent so much time on the Select Committee taking evidence, will he join me in encouraging the Minister to think again about how the London Olympic bid will be financed by the London Olympic lottery game?

Chris Bryant: I will say something about the financing. I believe that it is right that London is paying a significant proportion of the money. I would prefer the Exchequer to pay the rest of the money rather than the lottery, but one of the best reasons why London should have the Olympics is the fact that the whole of the UK supports it. The hon. Gentleman is way out of step with the people of Scotland and Wales, or the majority of the people in the UK. The Welsh support the bid coming to London more than the people of London do—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman is waving the Select Committee report at me, but I believe that everyone in the country wants it to happen.

As the lottery binds together the different elements that comprise the £750 million that will go towards the bid, it needs to ensure that it is not chucking the baby out with the bathwater by making it more difficult for elite athletes to do well and for grass-roots athletes to get started. I will be encouraging the rugby clubs in the Rhondda to send volunteers to the millennium stadium and to London. That will be just as good an impetus and support for those clubs as any money they have had in recent years from the lottery. For that matter, they have not had much money from the lottery. If the Minister wants to respond on that point as well, I will be grateful.

Another reason why I have supported the bid for a long time relates to one of the reasons why we will do it better than anyone else: we have the British Broadcasting Corporation. The BBC as a broadcaster of sport is sans pareil. No other broadcaster does it better. The BBC has been more innovative and has found new ways of showing sport, enlivening it and making it exciting. It has explained sports that people might not be used to watching and given them a platform. The BBC will do a phenomenal job as chief broadcaster of the Olympics in 2012, which is another good reason why they should come here.

Last week, the Select Committee went to Athens, and we noted significant issues that we need to bear in mind, including security. The atrocious events in Madrid a couple of weeks ago mean that we are bearing international terrorism in mind, but it is not only now that that will be the case. I suspect that the Olympics will face the problems of international terrorism this time round, next time round and certainly in 2012.

It is interesting that much of the international advice for the Athens Olympics has been provided by the United Kingdom. We have played a leading role in providing security support and recommendations. That puts the UK in a strong position for a bid for 2012. I know that some people have said that Britain should not host the Olympics because we are a more likely terrorist target than elsewhere, but I believe that we have the strongest network of intelligence services and that London would do a better job than many other places in the world because we have had to face terrorist threats for many decades. I hope that that would be seen not as something that tells against us, but as something that if anything tells in our favour.

On transport, having been to Athens last week and having sat on the bus for quite a long time going from one part of the Athens site to another, I know that large distances will have to be travelled in Athens in the middle of the summer. The transport issues will feature in any London bid. However, the truth of the matter is that the London bid is remarkably compact. The vast majority of athletes will not have to travel any distance at all, nor will many journalists, which is probably even more significant. There will be 22,000 journalists at the Athens Olympics. That beats the number of athletes by some 2,000 people, which is particularly interesting because only a few months ago it was expected that there would be only 15,000 journalists. It is important that we get the accommodation right first and foremost for athletes and the Olympic family, but also for all those who want to attend the events.

We should ensure that we get the transport aspects of the Olympic bid right, but we should not be too troubled. Compared with many other major cities in the world, we probably have—and certainly will have by 2012—the most compact bid and the best organised public transport system. The process of improving the infrastructure in east London between now and 2012 could only be good, for all the regeneration reasons that have already been advanced by other hon. Members.

Having seen Athens last week, I want to make the point that if we win the bid next year, it is vital that we do not leave starting to build the infrastructure and putting the events together for any time. We cannot even take the summer months off afterwards. Once we win the bid, we must kick-start the process immediately. We want to ensure that people do not write negative stories about the UK Olympics just before they have happened, and that everything is up and running and ready early on.

I will end with a point that has been mentioned by several others: I desperately hope that we will have a UK football team. Football is not my sport particularly, and I am aware that I am wearing a Burberry tie, which, when talking about football, is not necessarily thought of as a good combination. However, if we can have a UK team in rugby union, where there is a long tradition of the home nations playing against each other, there is no reason why we cannot have a UK football team. It would be a terrible dereliction of duty by the football authorities, and probably by the political and cultural class, if we did not ensure that there was a UK team winning in the millennium stadium as a great finale to Britain's successful bid for the Olympics in 2012.

2.59 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce) on securing the debate, one of a number that he has held on this issue. I welcomed the vast majority of what he had to say and his positive support for the bid for the 2012 Olympics. I have only one small criticism of the hon. Gentleman and of all who have contributed to the debate so far: there has been no mention of the fact that this is a bid not only for the Olympics but for the Paralympics. That is a crucial component of the bid. [HON. MEMBERS: "He mentioned it."] In that case I apologise to the hon. Gentleman.

We should always remember that this is a linked bid. The fact that this country was the home of the Paralympics is an additional reason why I hope we will be selected. Indeed, there are many reasons why our bid stands a good chance of being successful. We have hosted the Olympics on only two previous occasions. We did so in 1908, at very short notice, when we took over from Rome because of its problems with a significant volcano, and in 1948 after the 1940 and 1944 Olympics had been cancelled because of the second world war. It is about time that we had another bash at it. We are much better prepared these days than we were in the past.

A point rarely mentioned is that we are one of only a few countries that have participated in each of the modern Olympics, alongside Australia, France, Greece and Switzerland. The bid team have already put together an exciting and imaginative bid. I want to touch on some of the security points raised by the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant). His contribution and those of the hon. Members for Falkirk, West and for West Ham (Mr. Banks) were in stark contrast to the huge negativity of the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart). I am told that this is not the first time that he has made his speech. I have not heard it before so I cannot say whether it has improved. One thing is true: it was extremely negative and unnecessarily so. It was also based on a string of false premises, and I shall touch on some of those in a minute.

I am happy to be party to the cosy consensus, as the hon. Gentleman described us, of those who support fully and absolutely our bid for the Olympics and the Paralympics. London was the right city to put forward, but we must ensure it is not only London that benefits from a successful bid. Huge benefits will accrue to the rest of the United Kingdom too, although greater benefits will accrue to London. We have already heard of the money that will be spent on regeneration and on improving the transport infrastructure. We have heard about the jobs that will be created and the benefit that the games will bring to an area of London that is suffering from high levels of deprivation and unemployment. The Olympics coming to London and the rest of the UK is an exciting prospect. There will be millions of visitors. An estimated 3.7 billion people watch the Olympics. What a huge boost that will be for tourism in London and the other areas of the country featured in the TV coverage, which, as the hon. Member for Rhondda said, the BBC will no doubt provide extremely well.

There will be huge benefits outside London, too. Some 200 competing countries will come here looking for training villages all around the country. I urge the Minister to ensure that the British Olympic Association and the Government provide support to all regions to enable them appropriately to package information for the visiting countries so that they know of the wide range of opportunities that exist throughout the UK. Various events, such as football, will take place in different parts of the country.

The hon. Member for North Tayside is fundamentally wrong to say that this will have a detrimental impact on sport in Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland or any other part of the UK. As I said in an earlier intervention, I believe that there will be a huge benefit to sport. We should consider the impact of major sporting activities that have taken place outside the UK in which the UK has competed. Most recently, our success in rugby has had a huge impact on the take-up of rugby, both in playing at all levels and in spectating. There will be a huge boost to the take-up of a wide range of sports by young people and others as a result of the Olympics coming to the UK. That, I believe, will be far superior in its impact to spending a bit extra on supporting community sports activities, although we all want to see that money spent.

Normally, my party is reluctant to suggest that the Government should impose their will on how lottery money is spent. We opposed the establishment of the New Opportunities Fund because we believed that it breached the principles of additionality. However, there will always be exceptions to the rule, and because of the huge benefits—in sport, regeneration and tourism—that the Olympics will bring to London and the rest of the UK, we argued that this was one of those exceptions, and supported the use of lottery money as part of the package of funding to underpin what I hope will be a successful bid.

[Pete Wishart]

Pete Wishart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Foster: I will in a minute. The hon. Gentleman gave the impression—others outside might misinterpret what he said—that all the lottery money going to the Olympics would come from funding for existing good causes. As he knows, it is intended that there will be a new, exciting lottery game specific to the Olympics, and that at least 50 per cent. of the lottery funding will come from that rather than be taken from the other good causes.

The hon. Gentleman will also know, because he will have done his homework, that those who worked out how much money would be generated by the new Olympic lottery game and how much would need to come from the other good causes may have been too pessimistic. He will know that recent figures show that, for the first time in a number of years, the amount of money coming into the national lottery has levelled out. He will also know that the European game that is being planned is likely to increase the revenue from the lottery, which may mean that the loss to the other good causes will be far less than was originally predicted.

Pete Wishart: It is estimated that £1.5 billion will be lost from the lottery to pay for the Olympic games. In Scotland that will be £41.8 million. The hon. Gentleman should speak to the sports and other volunteer organisations in his constituency to gauge their anxieties about those suggestions. There will be an impact on grass-roots sports, and I wish that the hon. Gentleman would come to that conclusion. We must balance whether the Olympics are worth having with the impact on, and costs to, grass-roots sports facilities and organisations in our constituencies. I would like the hon. Gentleman's views on that.

Mr. Foster: My views are quite simple—the hon. Gentleman is factually wrong. I have no doubt that the Minister, who will have more time to speak than me, will give the figures correctly. The £1.5 billion that will come from the lottery includes the money taken from existing causes plus the additional money that will be generated through the new Olympic lottery game. As I suggested, the hon. Gentleman bases his figures on a false premise.

I say to the hon. Member for West Ham that I entirely support his proposal for a British Olympic football team. On Saturday, I went to watch Charlton Athletic play at the Valley and, although they lost, they demonstrated that it is possible to bring together people from several different countries who speak several different languages and to play extremely well. It would be far easier to bring together people from just four countries who speak the same language to create a successful football team. I was disappointed, however, to hear him announce—for the first time, I think—that by 2012, he does not expect to be a Member of this House.

Mr. Banks: I will be dead.

Mr. Foster: I am sorry to hear the hon. Gentleman say that.

Finally, the hon. Member for Rhondda is right to draw attention to concerns about terrorism, and to the fact that the London bid proposes one of the most compact Olympic bids, with a large proportion of the major sports to take place in a small area, with a compact Olympic village. I hope that that will be taken on board. We fully support the bid, and we hope that it will be successful, as we know that it will benefit not only London, but the whole UK.

3.11 pm

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce) on securing the debate, which has given us an opportunity to speak again about matters that many of us feel passionately about. I particularly congratulate him on what he rightly said about the Paralympics, which the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) unfortunately failed to observe. I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Falkirk, West about that. I have had the privilege and pleasure of meeting many of our Paralympic athletes over many years. The Paralympics began in this country, and we should be proud of that.

As the hon. Member for Bath correctly said, it is a bid for the Olympics and the Paralympics, and we should not forget that. I was talking to some of the leaders of the British Paralympic Association at the official launch at the Royal opera house, and I am sure that everybody will remember the contribution that the association has made, and continues to make. I know that we will win a great many medals at the Paralympics in Athens, as I hope we will in the main games. Seeing what Paralympic athletes can do inspires generations of young people to overcome their disabilities. Going back to the origins of the Paralympics at Stoke Mandeville, one can only admire the work that has been done over many years.

I referred in previous debates to the fact that my constituency is likely to be a beneficiary of a successful bid in 2012, so I declare that interest. The one site that we know will inevitably be part of a successful bid will be Bisley in my constituency. In fact, the National Rifle Association's headquarters straddles the boundary between my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Malins). We already benefit from huge numbers of visitors to the area during international shooting competitions.

The answer to some of the negative comments made not only by the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart), but in interventions by the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer) is that the whole country can benefit from international competitions, as we saw from the successful Manchester Commonwealth games. The fact that the only site for the Manchester Commonwealth games in the south of England was in my constituency—the shooting had to be there, and I had the privilege and pleasure of being asked to present medals there—is another example of how the whole country can share in and benefit from any international sporting event.

Mr. Banks: Would I be wrong in suggesting that the hon. Gentleman might like to see some members of his Conservative association used as targets for shooting?

Mr. Hawkins: I am not going to respond in any way to my good cross-party friend, the hon. Member for West

Ham (Mr. Banks). However, I echo the hon. Member for Bath in hoping that the hon. Member for West Ham will continue to be an hon. Member in 2012. I was amazed when he talked about the risk of decrepitude, because he is still young and vigorous. I am certain that he will have the opportunity to present medals in his own constituency in 2012; I had the good fortune to present medals in mine during the Commonwealth games.

On a more serious point, there are some issues about funding, to which I hope the Minister will respond, which I hope will deal with some of the negative aspects of the contribution by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West. The Conservatives have said that we completely support the Olympic bid and will continue to do so. However, there are a couple of issues to which we think the Government have not yet paid sufficient attention. We have repeatedly said that it would be good for the Olympic lottery game to start when interest in the Olympics is at its height—this summer, to coincide with Athens. The Government originally suggested that that was not possible under BOA rules but, when we pressed them about it, they admitted that it was allowed under BOA rules but they were not going to do it.

There is still time for the Government to change their mind, and I hope that they will because the earlier the Olympic lottery game starts, the greater the opportunity for other good causes not to be adversely affected. I do not believe that they will be adversely affected because, like the hon. Member for Bath, I believe that there will be such an explosion of interest that the Olympics games will be able to make even greater earnings if they are handled correctly, as I hope and believe they will be.

One funding lesson learned by the Olympic movement worldwide after the success of the Los Angeles games and the work of Peter Ueberroth was to bring the private sector more into the picture. As yet, the Government have not placed enough stress on the importance of the private sector. I know that Barbara Cassani and her team are doing a lot of work with not only the City of London but businesses nationwide and internationally, and I want to do all that I can to encourage that.

If we are right in believing that there will be an explosion of enthusiasm after we win the bid, there is every opportunity to prevent adverse effects on the funding for grass-roots sport. That is what the hon. Member for North Tayside claims his concerns are all about, but his repeated comments that it is a London bid and that London should pay for it reveal the attitude of his party. Any other concerns are window dressing to reinforce what is really a campaigning approach by the Scottish nationalists that I deeply deplore.

I strongly support what the BOA is doing under the splendid leadership of Simon Clegg, and Barbara Cassani has a very good team behind her. When we win the bid, as I am confident that we will, I hope that we will see opportunities for sports generally—not only Olympic sports—to spread their message more widely. As the hon. Member for Bath said, the winning of the rugby world cup has proved an inspiration, with many more young people volunteering to start playing rugby at every age. That can happen in every sport, and I hope and believe that it will. As has been said often, we have seven years for that explosion of interest to happen.

It is crucial to recognise that sport is a way of taking young people away from dangers such as the drugs sub-culture, and of making them aware of the importance of health and fitness. I know that the Minister agrees with me about that and that those objectives are shared across parties, so we must use the Olympics for that. I was inspired by the example of competitive swimmers. In his robust contribution, the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) spoke about how he was ill during the 1972 Olympics and so watched it all on television. One performance that he will have seen was that of the then captain of my swimming club, Brian Brinkley, who is just about to finish coaching Northampton swimming club to go back to our club, the Bedford Modernians.

As I am sure the hon. Gentleman remembers, Brian Brinkley made the freestyle final at the 1972 Olympics. Young competitive swimmers such as I were inspired by having people such as him in their small home-town club. Bedford had great links with rowing and rugby but, until the existence of the Bedford Modernians under the coaching inspiration of Charlie Wilson, who was our national squad coach for the 1972 Olympics, we did not see Bedford as a hugely important sporting town. Suddenly finding that the captain of our swimming club was leading the British team was fantastically inspirational to me and to all the other teenage swimmers in the club. That will happen throughout the country to young people with the 2012 Olympics.

We must recognise the huge benefits and not start nit-picking in the way that the hon. Member for North Tayside wants to do. I shall do a deal with him: after we have won the bid, if I meet any members of the IOC in my capacity as deputy chairman of the all-party group on sports, or as shadow spokesman on sport and they ask me where in the UK would be a good place to have a training base, I shall suggest Pitlochry and Dunkeld. If I manage to convince some countries to have their training camps there, perhaps the Scottish nationalists will give up their relentless negativity. All other parties are united and every other hon. Member who has spoken in the debate has supported the Olympic bid. I believe that we can win it, and I certainly hope that it will inspire a generation of young people to get involved in sport. It would be a wonderful thing for the UK and we should do all we can to support the Olympic bid.

3.20 pm

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): It may be the third or fourth time that hon. Members in the Chamber have debated the Olympics but it is my first. I promise you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and Tourism has not avoided the debate so as not to have to listen to the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) repeat his speech—he is in Liverpool on ministerial business.

I welcome the opportunity to speak in the debate. In response to the direct question from my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Mr. Banks), I add my personal support—I join the cosy circle of support—for the Olympic bid. It is a good bid, and it is important that we are united; we will not win the bid if the country is not seen to be behind it. Therefore, I know that my hon. Friends will understand if on this occasion I thank the hon. Members for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) and for

[Estelle Morris]

Bath (Mr. Foster) for the support that their parties have given. They both spoke forcefully, and well understand the importance of sport to the nation and what the games will bring to all of us if the bid is successful.

There is a real issue about how the regions would be affected. I am a Mancunian by birth and my constituency is in Birmingham, so perhaps I have more reason than most in the Chamber to groan about the inability of cities other than London to compete successfully for the Olympics. That time is past. We are behind London as the United Kingdom city that is bidding. I have no doubt that the rest of the United Kingdom will benefit, but the effort has to be made. There will be no benefit if no one makes the effort, and we will benefit most by being enthusiastic and getting behind the bid. As constituency MPs in whatever area of the country, we owe to it to our constituents and our regions to shout up for them and to explain how that region can contribute and gain.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce) on securing the debate and I support what he said about the nations and regions support group's work travelling around the country to ensure that there is a regional legacy. That was an important move and it was important to make it early in the life of the 2012 bid. The senior team on the bid has already visited several countries and regions, including Scotland last October, when Barbara Cassani herself led the team to listen and to ensure that there is a legacy.

I remind hon. Members that the £340 million that the sports councils are putting in is to ensure that the Olympic games have a legacy. It is an important funding stream to ensure that, in getting the bid together and hosting the games, we see a legacy in every region possible.

I will not pretend that it would be right or possible to spread the Olympic venues across the country. Several hon. Members have mentioned that one attraction of the bid is the proximity of the sites to each other. It means that most athletes, with some exceptions for specialised sport, will not have a long way to travel, and that journalists, who we know do not like travelling outside Westminster, let alone the confines of the M25, will not have far to travel either. Ironically, one attraction of the bid is that it is centred in one geographical location.

Hon. Members have mentioned that training camps could be anywhere in the United Kingdom. If one looks at where the UK has chosen to base its training camps, it rarely stayed close to where the Olympics took place. Teams want to be away from that fevered atmosphere and to train in privacy and in a quieter atmosphere. There is a lot to be gained if an Olympic team trains away from London. If football matches were held outside London, that would help that to take place. I support my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham in saying that it would be good for us to have a football representation. That is a matter for the sporting bodies but, if it can be progressed, I am sure that no one would take exception.

The next point that I wish to make goes to the heart of the points that the hon. Member for North Tayside made about finance. It concerns the atmosphere that will be created for sport in the United Kingdom. I think that the mistake that he makes is often made not just in sport but in other areas of life. He is forcing us to choose between excellence and access, which are old things that people pit against each other and cite as enemies. I see the Olympic games as a celebration of excellence in sport. That is not to say that we do not treasure access, or continue to put money into access. I think that access is more successful if people can see excellence in practice. Excellence motivates people to participate in sport.

I do not have figures on the matter because it is not my area of ministerial responsibility, but I have been interested and participated in sport throughout my life and still do. When Britain is no longer very good at one particular sport, general participation tends to fall. The reverse also happens: when someone does well and succeeds, general access increases. I do not take away from our obligation and from the necessity of investment of resources and effort at grass-roots level, but the hon. Member for North Tayside must accept that having the Olympics in the UK will encourage access.

Pete Wishart: I do not want excellence at the expense of access. I would rather have both. I am appealing to the Minister to reconsider the way in which this will be financed. Let us not take finance from the lottery. Let us have access and excellence.

Estelle Morris: The point I make is that the Olympics is the best way of showing excellence that I can think of, not just in one sport but in many. Do not forget that most people in the United Kingdom will never see an Olympics live but see it only on television. Hosting the games would give millions of people a chance to see live performance.

I come on to the financing. I disagree with the hon. Member for North Tayside that it should come from tax. People from Scotland will not necessarily pay less if it comes from general revenue rather than from lottery contributions. I did not follow the logic of that point. We anticipate that £1.5 billion will come from the lottery, £750 million of which will be from the Olympic lottery and £340 million from the Sports Lottery Board. On top of that, £625 million will come from London council tax payers and £250 million from the London Development Agency. I think that that is a good funding package. That is only the public sector funding package—money will also be raised from television rights, from ticket sales and through the private sector.

If a profit is made, that money will go back into sport at the grass roots. I wonder what the hon. Gentleman will say if we invest to get a return not only in excellence but, potentially, in money to the grass roots.

I wish the bid well. It is the best thing that we can do for sports. People in this country are proud of their country of origin but they are also proud of being UK citizens. This gives them an opportunity to celebrate that at the same time as celebrating sport.

Regional Broadcasting (East Midlands)

3.30 pm

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield) (Lab): I am extremely grateful to be given the opportunity to raise the concerns of my constituents, and others in the east midlands, about ITV's decision to close its Nottingham studio complex and move its operations to Birmingham in the west midlands. With respect to my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts, who is a west midlands and Birmingham Member, I believe that if the move is enacted, it will lead to the loss of at least 400 jobs and will be severely detrimental to those who reside in the east midlands. That would worsen rather than improve regional news-gathering and delivery services in the east midlands. People in the region would have to make do with second-hand and second-class news provision.

At the outset, I remind the Minister that ITV's decision flies in the face of its own charter for the nations and regions, which states:

"Regional news is one of the defining features and most popular aspects of ITV's output. ITV is committed to extensive regional and sub-regional news coverage in excess of that offered by the BBC."

I am not privy to any information that the BBC is about to announce the closure of its studios in Nottingham. It has active radio and television studios and a production centre in Nottingham, as well as production centres in the west midlands. Therefore, ITV's statement is false and its decision flies in the face of the facts.

ITV's actions represent little more than a slap in the face for its customers in the east midlands as well as for the aspirations of the region, which are distinct from those in the west midlands, to where ITV intends to transfer its production coverage.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): With all due respect to what goes on in Birmingham, it is clear that news from the west midlands bears no relevance to those of us living in Leicestershire, Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire, Derbyshire or Nottinghamshire. Whatever the protestations from ITV, the service will be reduced and we will be fed a diet of information from a region in which we have little or no interest.

Mr. Meale: I am grateful for that intervention, which is absolutely true. I represent an east midlands seat that almost borders the area covered by northern regional television, which comes from Leeds. It is easier for colleagues and me to attract news services from Leeds than from Birmingham—it is almost impossible to get news coverage from Birmingham, even for specialist events. I remind the Minister of a tragic event in my constituency a few years ago: the announcement of the closure of almost every pit in Nottinghamshire. Even that could not persuade Birmingham to send news coverage crews; stringer and independent services were employed, which did not cover the event as seriously as they should.

I also remind the Minister that a little over two decades ago, a major campaign was launched by east midlands Members of all parties for a regional television centre in the east midlands. That was an active and successful debate, because the Government of the day accepted that the east midlands needed an opportunity to show its character through a centre for news and current affairs delivery for local people. In the same spirit as that of 20-odd years ago, I intend to give way to any colleagues from the east midlands who want to participate in the debate. It is imperative that we engage in this debate if we are to have any chance of saving an essential service.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware that a number of us have written to Ministers and to the body overseeing commercial TV, and he will know the response that we received. One of the main points in the response is that the regional TV company is spending a lot of money in the east midlands on further news-gathering facilities and on the ability to feed information to Birmingham. How does he answer that response?

Mr. Meale: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, because I received the same letter—indeed, it was sent to all east midlands Members. I was, at the very least, disappointed. In fact, I thought the letter a disgrace. I thought that I was receiving a letter from the chief executive of ITV—it read exactly like that. It is not the job of Ofcom to do the dirty deals and business of ITV. Rather, it was established to protect ordinary people's rights, needs and aspirations in respect of creative media communications coverage.

I was also disappointed that, five or six days after I tabled the early-day motion to which all colleagues in this Chamber have added their signature, I received a telephone call from a senior Ofcom official who made various excuses as to why ITV should be allowed to do what is proposed and said that it was quite a good thing and TV coverage would generally progress. I had to remind her that it was not her job to serve ITV. Ofcom's job is different: it is about public protection.

Many hon. Members here today and some who are in Committees elsewhere are furious about the situation. For those who represent seats in the east midlands, it is causing major anger and disquiet. We cannot understand why these events are occurring. We all believe that the proposals are extremely detrimental and will lead to nothing other than the east midlands once again becoming, as it was 20-plus years ago, the Cinderella region and—I say this with all due respect to the Minister and the seat that she represents—being reliant on the bigger, brasher brother in Birmingham for any coverage that it receives on major issues that are important to the people of our region.

Let us consider some of the facts that I have managed to glean on the issue. Since the formation of the single ITV company, hundreds of jobs have been lost in TV broadcasting in the regions, and studios have been closed irrespective of their profitability. The first closure programme involved the Northam studios in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), who takes a close interest in these matters. Those studios, which were the birthplace of programmes such as "The Ruth Rendell Mysteries", "Worzel Gummidge" and "That's Life", closed with the loss of 175 jobs. Other studios have closed in other parts of the country. Now it is the turn of Nottingham, the home of shows such as "Family Fortunes", "Popstars" and "Who Wants To Be A Millionaire?". Just as importantly, it is the base of "Central News East", the hub of news delivery for the east midlands, which has regularly won awards for its coverage, including the world gold medal this year for its programming.

The Government are deeply committed to regionality. As recently as June 2002, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport said in respect of broadcasting:

"Regional character matters. We will look to Ofcom to defend it with vigour."

Sadly, as has been pointed out, we are getting no vigour at all when it comes to the protection of people's rights and the opportunity to receive fair and decent local coverage. Instead, we are getting representation by Ofcom in favour of amalgamation and the isolation of regions such as ours.

If we do not get our act together, worse is yet to come. A significant period elapsed before the proposed closure was challenged. If we rely simply on Ofcom, it will be too late. The boards and shutters will be put up on the studios. The teams will be disbanded and lost. Journalism will have to rely on Birmingham as the main area of supply. All the good work and all the money that has been spent on recruitment, technology, mechanisms and methods for these people to work will be gone and will be difficult to replace.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend confirm that part of this sense of loss, to which Ofcom seems quite indifferent, stems from the fact that Carlton gave a commitment to the east midlands that it would match and better the BBC's investment, commitment and performance? The irony is that in Nottingham we currently have an expanded base of BBC news coverage at the same time as the commercial sector proposes to remove its base from Nottingham completely. Is not that why we need the Government to intervene in the face of both the crude commercialism that will shift the regional commitment away from Nottingham and Ofcom's failure to protect those regional commitments?

Mr. Meale: My hon. Friend is right. As I said, it is Ofcom's job to represent people and to safeguard and protect their rights and opportunities in this respect. He is right about the investment. There is a commitment in the ITV charter to expand news services more than the BBC. That has not been done. It has not even been proposed. This is solely about profit. I have just reminded the Minister and hon. Members about the very profitable programmes that have been made in Nottingham such as "Family Fortunes", "Popstars" and "Who Wants to be a Millionaire?". Nottingham is profitable. It may not profitable enough for the people at ITV who want to disband it and cash in on it, but that is not a good enough reason to do so.

To move the production from Nottingham to Birmingham would be a disaster and would lead to the wholesale break-up of news teams and the dislocation of operations. Worse still, it would undermine the relationship between broadcasting and its audience, a vital ingredient in any local communication provision. That is a factor that even Charles Allen, the chief executive of ITV, admitted in October 2002 when he stated:

"People like local TV. People like local news and we would be daft not to encourage it."

He is not doing that at present. He is encouraging local news, but that local news is not in the east midlands, it is in the west midlands. In the east midlands, it is yet another part of the jigsaw which is about controlling all news networking throughout Britain and reducing the costs.

I should not need to remind the Minister that at the heart of the debate lies the fact that the east midlands has a firmly established identity of its own. It is socio-economically and culturally different from its neighbours, most notably the west midlands and Birmingham in particular. Its industries, which are predominantly food production, coal mining, clothing, textiles and other types of apparel production, contrast with the engineering, car manufacturing and high-tech industries of the west midlands. The difference is probably best expressed by the two regional development areas that represent the two regions. They have a different make-up, they have different characters on their boards and they are geared to the needs of the various local interests.

As I said earlier, I intend to give time to other hon. Members to speak, so I will summarise briefly. According to a recent report by Cambridge Econometrics, two thirds of people claim that their local television company is their main source of local news, so Government action to protect it is imperative, especially if the reorganisation of local radio is anything to go by. Local news nowadays is little other than a series of regurgitated sound clips produced and broadcast mostly from centres that in some cases are hundreds of miles from the neighbourhoods they serve—or do not serve.

The same will undoubtedly be the case if TV programmes are produced and staffed by people who neither live in nor have any affinity with the areas that they are reporting, a likely scenario if the closure of ITV centre Nottingham goes ahead.

For those reasons and others, I ask the Minister to intervene in the matter. It is crucial to the east midlands that, like her constituency in the west midlands, we have the opportunity to develop our region in a way that suits the hearts, minds, needs and aspirations of the people we serve. It is not good enough, just for the sake of profit, for these centres to be closed down and left to the people who made such a mess of the City, the stock exchange and the pension provisions of most of our constituents.

3.47 pm

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): I feel a bit like the enemy in this debate, but I do not intend to be. I want to put on record how much I understand the strength of feeling of my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) and the hon. Members who intervened about the importance of regional broadcasting. Members of Parliament understand that more than anyone else; our constituents are far more likely to know what individual MPs are up to in the House through regional television coverage than through national television. Much of our accountability is discharged through regional news coverage, in newspapers and broadcasting. I am at one with my hon. Friend in that respect.

I accept that Birmingham has a tendency to dominate the midlands region; the history and the news of the east midlands is different and there is a danger that it will get squeezed out. I go further: I hear complaints from people in Solihull that Solihull gets squeezed out, although it adjoins Birmingham, let alone from those who are about 50 miles down the road to the east.

My starting point is the same as that of my hon. Friend: the east midlands has a specific voice and a specific set of interests and concerns, and we need to pay regard to them. However, I cannot say much more to give comfort to him. It is for Ofcom, not the Government, to intervene in the matter. I cannot intervene or promise that the Government will do so, as that will not be done. I shall therefore explain how the mechanism for accountability and checking works.

The starting point is to balance two things, the first of which is the right of any company to organise itself as it sees fit. Companies must have that right, whether or not they are broadcasters. It is a competitive world and they must be able to change to survive, not just because people's viewing and listening habits have changed, but because of technology, too. That is just the way life is. It would be wrong to put a stranglehold on broadcasting companies and say that they cannot change to meet those needs. Secondly, broadcasting companies play an important role in safeguarding our democracy which is different from any other private sector organisation in any other sector of the economy. The regulatory framework must combine both those aspects.

I want to talk about how that happens and try to reassure hon. Members about what may happen in the future.

Mr. Meale rose—

Alan Simpson rose—

Estelle Morris: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield and then to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson).

Mr. Meale: The letter from Ofcom states that the "amount of sub-regional news for the East Midlands is mandated by Central's licence—4 hours a week averaged over a calendar year."

Coverage for the east midlands region, which stretches right the way down to south Leicestershire and the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall), up to north Nottinghamshire and across to Derbyshire and Lincolnshire, and incorporates Nottingham, the eighth largest city in Britain, is being reduced to four hours a week. That is the reality.

The issue is not just about Ofcom saying that it will do one or two things about the news. We have one of the biggest production sites, 17 acres, in the whole of Britain. It is an important centre—we have proved that with the programmes that we have brought out—but the site is being closed and sold off for a fast buck. That is not good enough for the people of the east midlands.

Estelle Morris: Before I respond I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South.

Alan Simpson: I want the Minister to return to the point that she made about Ofcom's responsibilities. We are not talking about Ofcom standing in the way of the commercial viability of companies. In fact, many of us would argue that some of the financial mess that has been made is due to the short-termism of the company's outlook. Is it the Minister's view that Ofcom has a duty to protect the regional identity of independent commercial television services because of the way in which the Government expect those services to be delivered? A central point of dispute seems to be whether Ofcom feels that it has a duty in that respect at all.

Estelle Morris: I will answer my hon. Friends' comments together. Yes, I do think that that duty exists, and I shall explain how it works. There are targets, which my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield just referred to, for four hours of local news. That figure has not been reduced. It is part of the contract that Central has with Ofcom for delivering localness. Indeed, localness is written into the Communications Act 2003 in a way that it was not included in legislation before. The Government have acted to protect localness by including in primary legislation the requirement that Ofcom must have regard to it. That is absolutely at one with what my hon. Friend is saying.

On localness, people must know where they stand. When the commercial contract is signed, companies are given targets for the delivery of local programming and production which they must meet. Local programming is what we are debating: programmes about local issues, made outside the M25. No matter how Carlton reorganises itself, those targets remain the same. They do not change because of the merger or job losses. People cannot say, "We're closing the east midlands centre, so we're reducing the number of hours of local news that we'll broadcast." The four hours is part of the target of eight and a half hours of regional programming—or rather it is not a target, but a deal; it does not change. Four hours of that total is local news. The allocation was increased the last time that the targets were looked at.

Ofcom has a statutory duty to ensure that the targets are met and that any reorganisation of the delivery of services in the region does not negate them. In the commercial world, as long as those targets are met, companies have discharged their responsibility to achieve localness. As far as I am aware, nobody called for an Adjournment debate on those targets before the job losses were announced, so I can only assume that the debate is now about whether the targets will be met.

Mr. Jim Marshall: Will the Minister give way?

Estelle Morris: In a moment. I just want to make one more point so that there is some flow in what I am saying.

[Estelle Morris]

The crux of the matter is sub-regional news, not regional news. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield is saying that regional news from Birmingham is not serving the east midlands well. To me, the crucial point is that as well as targets for regional news coverage, there are targets for sub-regional news coverage. As midlands MPs, we all know there are three sub-regional news coverage areas: Birmingham, Abingdon and Oxford, and the east midlands. I believe Ofcom's view to be that the targets for the east midlands sub-regional news cannot be met if all the news gathering is moved to Birmingham. Therefore, if a situation should ever arise—this is not what is proposed—that affects news gathering as well as news presentation, there would be a genuine argument that sub-regional targets were not being met, and Ofcom could be invited by local MPs to comment on that point.

My hon. Friends may not believe it, but the proposal—I have no reason to disbelieve it and am not intervening—is that the presentation of news, not news gathering, should move to Birmingham. As long as the journalists who gather the news are in the east midlands and there is a sub-regional target for east midlands news, as opposed to west midlands news, there is a powerful argument that the target has been reached. If my hon. Friends do not believe that, we have a difference of opinion. We shall have to wait and see. However, if the journalists move, Ofcom can intervene to say that the targets are not being met.

Mr. Reed rose—

Mr. Meale rose—

Estelle Morris: I have time to take two interventions.

Mr. Reed: I understand the commercial arguments that the Minister is putting forward and the difficulty in intervening in such matters. However, quality is the one thing that seems to be missing from what has been said. Is she really convinced by what Ofcom, ITV and Carlton have been trying to tell us; that is, that the quality of local coverage can be guaranteed by the proposals that have been put forward? Personally, I do not believe them, so there is an issue at dispute. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) will be able to say in more detail why that will not happen. Is the Minister convinced that Ofcom is playing a proactive part? I know that it has a light touch, but to have no touch at all seems completely the wrong way to deal with the matter.

Estelle Morris: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield.

Mr. Meale: The evidence of previous closures shows a reduction in news delivery in the areas from which people moved. That is the reality, but I shall not challenge what the Minister said.

The whole point of this debate is that the east midlands is not a sub-region but a region all on its own. Its news is not to be subsumed by Birmingham or moved just because of improvements in technological delivery. The debate is about our having our own TV and news presentation centre in the east midlands. Without one, the east midlands is a sub-region.

The Minister comes from Birmingham. I know that there are difficulties with various TV stations, but Birmingham has its own centre. We want exactly the same for the east midlands, which, as I said, stretches from south Leicestershire to north Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire and Derbyshire. It is a massive area, and we demand parity in respect of a new centre.

Estelle Morris: Of course I do not believe that the east midlands is a sub-region, nor am I critical of it in any way. I used the term to discuss targets. Whether we like it or not, whether we live in the east or the west midlands, there is a midlands region, of which both areas are members. I certainly would not be happy if the news coverage all beamed out from Birmingham. My personal view is that if the news gathering from the east midlands were dropped, it would be detrimental to that area. I believe without a shadow of doubt that it would be a diminution of the present localism if all regional news from the whole of the midlands were collected and presented from Birmingham. All I can say to my hon. Friends is that that is not part of the proposal.

I cannot at this time stand up in a debate in the House of Commons and say, "I have been told by Central that its intention is to keep news collection in the east midlands and merely present the news from Birmingham, but, because I do not believe that, I shall ask Ofcom to intervene." It would not be fair to do so, because I believe what I am told by Central.

In the minute that I have left, all I can do is say again that the key thing in striking the difficult balance between having commercialism in broadcasting and protecting democracy is to hold the stations fast to their targets. My message to Ofcom is that that is what the House expects it to do. I suspect that the proposals before us will achieve that, but it will be for Ofcom to decide and to be the guardian of what all of us with seats in the midlands consider to be incredibly important targets.

Motorway Noise (Leicestershire)

4 pm

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise a matter of great concern to my constituents in Leicestershire, particularly in light of the Government's stated intentions to reduce motorway noise. One only needs to visit Enderby in my constituency, for instance, or the surrounding areas of Whetstone, Narborough, Littlethorpe and Cosby to appreciate the full extent of the noise that my constituents suffer on a daily basis and have suffered for nearly 40 years.

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.10 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Robathan: Having been so rudely interrupted, I am delighted to return to the subject of motorway noise in Leicestershire on behalf of my constituents. As I was saying, one has only to visit the motorway area near Enderby to appreciate the full extent of the noise that my constituents suffer daily. It is often impossible to stand outside their houses and hold a normal conversation. My constituents cannot sit in their gardens in the summer; they cannot open their windows; and they cannot sleep at night. There is an endless roar, which gets a little quieter between 1.30 and 4.30 in the morning, but then starts up again and wakes them. Last October I visited Cumberwell drive in Enderby, where an official from the Highways Agency had come to hear the grievances of a large group of residents, the most voluble of whom were Mrs. Bingham and Mr. Akiens. I urge the Minister to visit Enderby because he would then understand the unacceptable level of noise.

The M1, as I am sure you remember, Mr. Deputy Speaker, was the first motorway in this country. It was opened to Lutterworth in 1962 and the stretch through Enderby was opened in, I believe, 1964. It bisects my constituency and south Leicestershire from the junction of the M1 and the M6 up to the Leicester Forest East service station. The noise problem affects people from Lutterworth all the way to Thorpe Astley and Braunstone. My house is about two miles from the motorway, but I can hear it clearly, although I am not arguing on my own behalf.

My constituents have suffered from the noise generated by the M1 for 40 years, but it is getting worse. Many people have bought their houses next to the motorway during those 40 years, but the M1 used to be relatively empty. A famous postcard, entitled "The most boring sight in Britain" and published in 1963, showed the M1 near Newport Pagnell with one car on it. That is no longer the case. As the Minister knows, traffic has increased dramatically during the last 40 years and especially during the last decade.

Last year, the Highways Agency told me that it plans to resurface the M1 between junctions 20 and 21 this coming summer. Resurfacing can reduce noise dramatically. I am not an authority on decibels, but I am told that resurfacing can reduce the noise impact by up to 50 per cent. The Minister may tell me that I am wrong, but such a reduction would obviously be welcomed by my constituents. However, on 29 October, the agency told me that it was postponing the work for four years. That is unacceptable. The agency is a creature of the Government, and that is why I called for this debate and asked the Minister to come here today. My constituents do not want to be fobbed off any longer by the agency or the Government. Today, I seek clarification of the reasons for the delay in the work.

I asked the Minister a simple oral question on 6 January but failed to receive an answer, so I hope that I shall receive straightforward explanations and answers to my questions today. In a written reply to a question, numbered 140803, in which I had asked how many road resurfacing projects had been delayed due to value management work, the Minister stated:

> "The re-phasing of projects is not the result of value management work, but arises from a reappraisal of factors that influence the appropriate timing of works to be undertaken, in the light of better information."—[Official Report, 5 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 52W.]

Yet I received a letter dated 29 October last year from Richard Bennett, who is a board director of the Highways Agency, in which he stated that confirmation of the work was > "subject to the outcome of further value management work."

That is the process that the agency uses to assist us when deciding programming priorities.

Mr. Bennett's remarks directly contradict those of the Minister, and when the hon. Gentleman speaks I would be grateful if he clarified whether he stands by his remarks. I repeat the question from 6 January, "Who is right: the Minister or the Highways Agency?"

The Minister also stated in a letter on 10 February:

> "Increased costs meant that a reassessment of"

the work's

> "value for money was necessary".

Yet, despite my requests no details about what exactly caused the rise in costs have been forthcoming. In a written answer to me, the Minister stated:

> "Final cost details for resurfacing of the M1 between Junctions 20 and 21 will not be available until current investigations by the Highways Agency are completed."

That suggests that there has been no accurate and detailed costing for the work. Is the Minister saying that there has been a sudden increase in prices? If so, where is the evidence for it? The Government's response seems entirely illogical. In the same set of written answers, the Minister told my constituents that

> "priority will be given to those cases in which the actual noise levels exceed those predicted by at least three decibels". —[Official Report, 24 February 2004; Vol. 418, c. 340W.]

The Highways Agency finds roadside noise levels in Enderby of 86 dB, which is about 6 dB over its own acceptable limit. The Minister might be interested to know that as I trawled through the Secretary of State's announcement of April last year, as the Minister suggested I do, I stumbled on one particular gem. It stated that only since 1973 have

> "the adverse noise effects of road proposals on the surrounding environment and possible ways of minimising these effects been more comprehensively taken into consideration before the road is built."

In other words, according to the Secretary of State's paper, the effects of noise were not considered when the stretch of motorway between junctions 20 and 21 was built, and no serious sound reduction measures have ever been taken. Meanwhile, my constituents in Enderby, Narborough, Whetstone, Cosby, Littlethorpe, Lutterworth and Thorpe Astley continue to suffer. They have not benefited from noise reduction surveys or strategies since the road was built 40 years ago.

The noise is now worse than ever, and as the programme has been put back four years my constituents are condemned to another four years in the same situation. The Secretary of State's statement was, as the Minister suggested to me, a veritable treasure trove of information. Although the Minister told me that "better value for money would be obtained by undertaking more work than simply resurfacing"

and that

"priority is given to road surfaces that are broken up", the Secretary of State pointed to the need to prioritise work that "would not normally need to be resurfaced within the plan period".

In other words, that is work that would need to be undertaken for reasons other than simple maintenance—for reasons such as noise reduction, for instance.

The Highways Agency's own consultants, WS Atkins, open their noise survey paper, dated 22 September, by stating:

"Following the Government's Transport White Paper in 1998, a budget has been allocated to deal with specific noise problems on existing trunk roads and motorways."

Will the Minister contradict the remarks of the agency and the Secretary of State or will he accept that there is money ring-fenced for noise reduction separate from the needs of maintenance? In light of those facts the justification for postponing the work is simply not reasonable.

The agency website states that the Government's two criteria for priority are that the road must have been opened before 1988—the stretch of road under discussion opened before 1969 and has remain untouched—and that noise levels immediately adjacent to the road must be at least 80 dB. As I have said, the agency found levels to be some 6 dB higher at 86 dB. The M1 between junctions 20 and 21 must surely fulfil those criteria and should surely be at the top of the list of motorway stretches to be resurfaced.

In the consultancy paper to which I referred, WS Atkins considered options for reducing the noise, particularly between Enderby and Cosby. They found 160 houses that were affected by noise levels of 68 dB or more. I recollect that the Department of Transport even bought some houses in Roy close in the early 1990s because of the impact of traffic. The report considers erecting noise barriers in particular, and the costs of such noise screening are not horrendous I urge the Minister to consider implementing noise screening along that stretch of the motorway as soon as possible—as happened, for example, in Luton, by junction 11, which I pass often. The conditions there are comparable.

The Atkins report found that a quieter road surface—a thin-wearing course—would reduce noise to all houses by approximately 3 dB. Decibels are a logarithmic unit of measurement, which, with my O-level maths, I am not sure that I understand, but I listened to a reduction of 3 dB on my computer less than an hour ago, and the effect was marked. I should like the road surfacing to be done now, and acoustic screening to be installed this year.

In his letter to me of 10 February, the Minister told me that the process for timetabling road improvements was "subject to continued review". This was reviewed, to the detriment of my constituents, in October. I hope that the Minister will say that he will review again the M1 from junctions 20 to 21, because the case for resurfacing the M1 this summer is overwhelming. My constituents are suffering now and have been suffering for 40 years: another wait of four years would be intolerable. The Government have promised quieter road surfaces and, in the 10-year plan, they claimed that "reducing noise from motorways and other trunk roads is an important priority".

Furthermore, paragraph 3 of the road projects section of the Highways Agency's website says:

"Consider the length of time people have endured traffic noise."

No one can have endured noise longer than those living next to the M1 because the M1 was the first motorway. Having had their expectations raised, my constituents demand that those promises be fulfilled and I look forward to the Minister giving them a satisfactory response.

4.22 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I congratulate the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) on securing this debate, and giving us a firm opportunity to focus on the Government's policy on quieter roads. In answer to an oral question in January, I told him that, were it not for this Government having such a policy—one did not exist before 1997—and had the money not been put in place, this debate would not have gone ahead at all. I remind him that we have made the policy a priority. He will appreciate that there are many other demanding priorities around the country which have been identified by hon. Members from both sides of the House who want roads attended to, but we have given that commitment.

Mr. Robathan: The Minister is absolutely right that the Government have made this policy a priority, and I remember being cheered up when I read about it in the 1998 transport White Paper. However, he will admit that quieter road surfaces, such as whisper concrete, were already being tested and installed before 1997.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, indeed, but this debate could not have taken place if it were not for the Government's policy. The hon. Gentleman must be aware, particularly in his part of the midlands, of recent growth in the area, a downside of which is added traffic volume and noise. Leicester and much of the midlands are thriving under this Government's economic policies. I am delighted that unemployment has fallen and employment is rising, and whenever I go there I find new enterprise coming into the area, but that generates traffic and movement of people. He asked me to visit Enderby, and if I have the opportunity to pop in when I am visiting, I would be delighted to do so and perhaps have a cup of tea with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Robathan: The Minister is very welcome—I will even pay for the tea.

Mr. Jamieson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that welcome.

The hon. Gentleman was at pains to ensure that our approach is consistent and equitable, which I believe it is. Before I go into the detail of the situation on the M1 in Leicestershire, in which he is particularly interested, I want to say more about the Government's quieter roads programme.

The strategic road network helps to support a healthy economy by providing the backbone for the effective distribution of goods and services and the easy movement of people. However, it is not without its disadvantages. People who live close to major roads sometimes experience the effects of increased noise, and the expansion of the road network inevitably disturbs the local environment. A balance that satisfies our economic and environmental needs has to be struck, and much can be done to minimise any negative impact on the environment. I often say that the Highways Agency is the second largest planter of trees in this country after the Forestry Commission. In our guidance to the agency, we take environmental matters seriously.

The Government have recently addressed public concerns about road traffic noise and are dedicating funds to noise mitigation. We accept that traffic noise is a concern for many people, and in the White Paper "A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England", published in July 1998, we gave the commitment:

> "In future, whenever a road needs to be resurfaced, we shall ensure that the most appropriate noise reducing surfaces are used for those areas where noise is a particular concern."

In March 1999, we announced sift criteria to identify the most serious and pressing cases and a ring-fenced budget of £5 million a year to deal with the most serious instances requiring practical and cost-effective noise-mitigation measures.

The hon. Gentleman referred to those criteria, but for the sake of clarity it would help to have them on the record. First, trunk roads must have opened before June 1988, although priority attention is given to locations affected by roads that have remained unaltered since October 1969, the qualifying date for the introduction of noise mitigation measures. Secondly, current—that is, 1998—noise levels immediately adjacent to the road must be at least 80 dB. If the hon. Gentleman wants a small lesson in logarithms and decibels, I will assist him for a small consideration.

It may be useful to point out that the M6 Preston bypass between junctions 30 and 32 was the first motorway. It opened in the late 1950s, although that was probably before the hon. Gentleman was born. The third criteria is that in the case of roads opened or altered after October 1969, noise levels must be at least 3 dB greater than predicted for the design when the road was planned. The aim is to address people's disappointment that noise levels mentioned during the planning process were different from those experienced when the road was eventually opened.

The hon. Gentleman will know that in November 1999, a list appeared in Hansard under cover of a letter from the chief executive of the Highways Agency, showing the most serious and pressing cases to be studied to ascertain the most practical and cost-effective solutions. That became familiarly known as the Hansard list, and by the time of the Government's 10-year plan, published in July 2000, the agency had been set the target of installing quieter surfaces on more than 60 per cent. of the trunk road and motorway network, including all concrete stretches, by 2010–11. That will benefit approximately 3 million people living within a third of a mile of such roads. Indeed, I believe that some of the hon. Gentleman's constituents have already benefited from resurfacing work on the M69 which has reduced noise. He looks curious, but if he ever takes that route, he will be able to see for himself how his constituents have already benefited from the Government's road noise reduction policy.

That policy over the period of the 10-year plan can be summarised as follows: a noise mitigation programme costing £5 million a year to address sites that meet the Hansard list criteria; resurfacing all concrete roads with quieter materials; and resurfacing black-top roads with quieter materials when normal maintenance is required. About 5 per cent. of the trunk road network at 70 different locations is constructed with a concrete surface. Clearly, given the scale of the problem, work cannot be completed overnight. Attempting to do so would not be practical because it would create a great deal of disruption on the network, so we shall phase in the work over 10 years . Concrete roads tend to be very robust, and often need resurfacing not because of deterioration but to ameliorate the effects of noise.

As part of the development of our road maintenance programme, the process of value management is applied to all major road renewal schemes to ensure that renewal schemes are technically robust and meet set standards. Proposed schemes are examined collectively to establish relative merits and priorities, and set criteria are used to assess schemes. The criteria for the prioritisation of resurfacing flexible trunk roads are related to the condition of the surface and include surface crack intensity, assessment of levels of rutting, unevenness, skid resistance, general wear and tear of surface material and the frequency of accidents associated with the road condition. Those criteria are used to determine the programme for resurfacing. The aim is to maintain the trunk road network using the principle of minimising whole-life costs, taking into account disruption to the road user and the need to keep the road in a safe and serviceable condition.

Turning to the condition of the M1 in Leicestershire, I fully understand the concerns of the hon. Gentleman and his constituents about noise from the M1. I accept that noise from roads is deeply intrusive to people who live near them, which is why we have developed a policy for tackling the noise from roads. In particular, I understand the specific concerns in the Narborough, Cosby and Enderby communities to the south of Leicester. That section of M1 was not identified as a specific site in the list published in Hansard in 1999, and therefore does not take as high a priority as those listed or other lengths of motorway and trunk road that have concrete carriageways.

[Mr. Jamieson]

To ensure that the most worthy sites are treated first, a nationwide ranking system has been developed. The section of road in question has what engineers call a flexible surface—a black-top surface—which means that it is not as noisy as roads with a concrete surface. Inevitably, therefore, the M1 in the hon. Gentleman's constituency will be given less priority in noise mitigation measures. Nevertheless, we have agreed that the Highways Agency should carry out noise surveys at particular locations where local people have expressed significant concern, and a number of locations in Leicestershire fall into that category.

A survey covering the communities of Narborough, Enderby and Cosby has been completed, and it indicates, as the hon. Gentleman said, that 190 houses are exposed to noise levels greater than 68 dB. That has enabled the agency to rank those sites against other locations in the country in order of severity. I can confirm to the hon. Gentleman that the three sites are not the most severely affected by noise. They are ranked in the order Narborough, Enderby and Cosby, but because they are close to each other it is likely that they will all benefit at the same time when resurfacing work is undertaken on that section of the M1. When considering noise mitigation measures the rankings are used to prioritise the programming of works.

The agency is also undertaking a survey at Kirby Muxloe in Leicestershire, near junction 21A of the M1. That survey is in its final stages and we expect a report shortly. However, it is not only the desire to reduce noise from busy roads that gives rise to the need to provide a new surface; the condition of the road network is constantly monitored to ensure that maintenance is undertaken at a time that gives maximum value for money.

A process of continuous value management—some difficulty may have arisen in the understanding of the term—is carried out to prioritise the work to be done with the funds available. Depending on the deterioration of a particular stretch of road, it may move up and down the list of priorities. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would expect us to do no less than that—to prioritise one road over another if it was deteriorating more rapidly.

The agency identified most of the motorway between junctions 20 and 21 as needing to be resurfaced within the next few years. The section is too long for the whole of it to be treated at once; hence the works are likely to be split into four phases. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the works were originally programmed to start in 2004 and to be completed over three years, starting with the section adjacent to junction 21. However, after being subjected to the process of continuous value management that I mentioned earlier, the works were reprogrammed, and they will be undertaken between 2005–06 and 2007–08. Depending on the condition of the road and further examination, the works will take place earlier or later in that period, so there will not necessarily be a delay of three years. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that a programme of work that takes place in 2005–06 is not that far away.

I realise that the hon. Gentleman is disappointed that the work has moved out of this part of the programme. However, if he has listened to some of the other debates held on such matters, and if he were to see some of the correspondence that I have received from hon. Members on both sides of the House, he would agree that it is fair to prioritise the works on the criteria set out.

I hope that what I have said has reassured the hon. Gentleman that the agency carefully and stringently analyses each road scheme in accordance with a list of priorities. I will ask agency officials to ensure that they keep him informed on the detailed in-year programme as it develops for the M1 in Leicestershire.

Although mitigating noise from trunk roads and motorways is a complex subject, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the Government are doing all that they can to ensure that we have a fair system, which will benefit the greatest number of people over the next few years. We try to be as fair as possible but it is inevitable that those further back in the process are impatient to see the work closest to their homes completed.

I undertake to ensure that the agency keeps the hon. Gentleman informed, because I realise that the issue is important to people living in that area. I hope that he will recognise that we have put a substantial amount of extra money into the programme, and that we are tackling the list of works based on current priorities. The debate has been useful, and I hope that my explanation has been helpful. If the hon. Gentleman wishes for further explanation, I shall be delighted to correspond with him.

Question put and agreed to.

Cast Metal Industry

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Ainger.]

9.30 am

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to have secured today's debate in the ballot—a success achieved after several fruitless attempts. I have been particularly keen to debate the subject in Westminster Hall because the cast metal industry faces serious problems, caused mainly by the shortage of scrap metal and the consequential soaring of prices but also due to other increases in the price of raw materials, which are putting additional pressure on the industry. As a result, one cast metal firm has gone to the wall—Keighley castings in Yorkshire. It would not be an exaggeration to say that unless action is taken a number of other companies could find themselves in a similar situation.

About two weeks ago, the Minister for Industry and the Regions met representatives from the cast metal industry to discuss the matter, for which I am grateful. None the less, the problems are becoming more serious week by week, so it is appropriate to have a wider debate, in which other hon. Members with similarly affected companies in their constituencies can express their views.

I declare an interest, Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am secretary of the all-party group on cast metal. I also have a distinct constituency interest, because no fewer than 11 foundries can be found in West Bromwich, West; indeed, I am told that my constituency has the highest number of foundries in the country. I am therefore particularly concerned about the impact of the problem on the welfare of my constituents.

I am proud to say that one of those companies, Eurotech Industries of Wednesbury, won the annual company of the year award, given by the Cast Metal Federation, for having invested and expanded over the past couple of years, and for winning new contracts. Like many cast metal companies, Eurotech supplies parts for the automotive industry, including BMW, Audi, MG Rover and DaimlerChrysler, and it has just won two more contracts to make roof castings for Skoda and BMW. I mention that to highlight the fact that although foundries are often thought of as "old" manufacturing industry, some successful companies have invested in new production techniques and are being very successful in a highly competitive market.

The success of one company cannot mask the real issues that confront the sector nationally. I stress the importance of the industry to the country. It has a national turnover of about £2.26 billion a year, and it employs 34,000 people in 580 companies. Most of those companies are small and medium-sized enterprises. Crucially, many of them are concentrated in traditional industrial areas with higher than average unemployment, and the loss of those companies would have a disproportionate effect on the local economy and the local community.

In my constituency, unemployment stands at 5.9 per cent. It has reduced by about a third since 1997, and the local economic situation has improved enormously over the past five years. However, the prospect of local cast iron companies folding, with the resulting unemployment, would be a serious setback. I cannot view it with equanimity.

The cast metal sector's market is hugely concentrated in the automotive industry, and about 50 per cent. of total production goes to the car industry. That is enormously significant in the west midlands, because the viability of the cast metal industry can have an impact on the automotive sector. Nationally, the industry produces 1.2 million tonnes of castings: 970,000 tonnes are ferrous castings, and 900,000 tonnes come from ferrous scrap, so scrap is a vital component of total castings production.

Scrap is vital. The proportion of scrap that we export has gone up from 40 per cent. in 1995 to 70 per cent. at present. Overall, there is sufficient scrap in the country, but the growth in exports is now causing local cast metal companies extreme difficulties. The result has been an increase in dock prices. Between January 2000 and January 2003, the price of low-grade scrap increased by just 30 per cent.—a significant but not devastating increase; but between January 2003 and January 2004, it increased by 130 per cent. The price of cast iron scrap increased by 70 per cent. and it seems to be increasing further.

Those price increases are caused almost entirely by China's economic expansion, which has led to a phenomenal increase in demand for steel and the raw materials used in its production. In 2002, crude steel production in China rose by more than 21 per cent., and it is expected to rise a further 20 per cent. in the coming year. China's production is greater than that of Japan and the United States put together; they are the two next largest producers, and manufacture huge amounts. Significantly, even China's current huge level of production is insufficient to meet its home demand. China's phenomenal growth has had a profound effect on raw materials and steel prices, but nowhere more so than in the scrap metal sector.

A further potential problem needs to be highlighted. Currently, only 10 per cent. of steel production in China involves electric arc furnaces, which use scrap metal. Therefore, with China using scrap in just 10 per cent. of its steel production, we have a world shortage of scrap. If China increases production using electric arc furnaces because of constraints on the supply of raw materials used in the other 90 per cent. of its steel production, there will be further significant pressures on the world scrap metal market.

What has been the reaction worldwide? The South Korean Government have already limited scrap exports. In the United States, an organisation called the Emergency Steel Scrap Coalition has been formed. Its president, Robert Stevens, has warned that the US is "facing a crisis in many manufacturing sectors".

Liz Blackman (Erewash) (Lab): Saint-Gobain Pipelines in Erewash, which employs 1,400 people and deals predominantly in ferrous scrap, has seen its prices for that commodity rise by 40 per cent. over the past year. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is vital that the Government examine how the global market is working, report back on whether it is fair and, if not, suggest ideas to address the inequalities?

Mr. Bailey: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Although it may be argued that the cost of scrap metal has gone up as a result of international free trade, there are other issues, such as the price of coke. We have no indigenous coke producer in this country. We have to import it from Europe or China, ironically, and there is some evidence that China is restricting the export of coke. Our cast metal producers face a double whammy: scrap metal prices are going up because of the pull of the Chinese economy, while the fact that China restricts the export of coke further drives up costs for cast metal companies in this country. The issue obviously has to be explored because there is some evidence that there is not a level playing field. Although we may be conforming to the best principles of international free trade, China, as the main beneficiary, is not doing so. The Government must explore that issue.

I return to my point about the United States. Mr. Stevens also commented that there is provision under US law for a possible remedy for injurious increases in steel scrap exports: the temporary imposition of export restrictions by the US Secretary of Commerce. Although the United States has done nothing yet, we have to recognise that there is a significant lobby in that country for restrictions on the export of steel scrap. If that were to take place, the impact on the international scrap metal market would be huge, over and above the problems faced at the moment.

Let us consider other countries. Italian producers of steel have already called for protectionist measures. Ukraine has a ban on scrap metal export and Russia has export duties. All over the world, there are already significant moves to ban the export of scrap metal or, in one way or another, to preserve scrap metal for particular host countries. The situation is already serious and has the potential to be devastating. As prices continue to rocket, more countries will be under greater pressure to take unilateral action to protect their interests.

Things might not be so difficult for cast metal companies if other raw materials were not also increasing in price. I have mentioned coke. When we consider the range of prices for raw materials used not only in the cast metal industry but in the steel industry as a whole, we find that the pull exerted by the expansion of the Chinese economy is increasing those prices across the board. Whatever elements are used in the production of cast metals and in the wider steel industry, they are all increasing in price and adding cost pressures to production.

Looking at the impact on other industries, there are three major players in the sector. The first is the scrap metal industry. It will not surprise hon. Members to learn that the scrap metal industry is happy with the current situation. It is enjoying prices that it has never had before. The industry legitimately points out that in this country it produces more scrap metal than is needed for the domestic market and that the current price is determined by global demand. Of course, that is true, but it prompts the question whether, if the global market price continues to accelerate as it is doing, some of the domestic bread and butter market could disappear. Although the scrap metal industry may be enjoying a boom at the moment, the loss of its domestic bread and butter market could mean that at some time in the future it will be dependent on a far more volatile and risky international market. Notwithstanding the current good times in the scrap metal industry, it is appropriate to exercise a cautionary note.

Soaring raw material prices have affected the steel industry as well as the cast metal industry. Corus has increased prices by 20 per cent., and there is an increase of another 18 to 20 per cent. in the pipeline. It accounts for about 90 per cent. of UK steel production. The industry has been more relaxed about the issue of scrap metal prices, but that is largely because it has contractual agreements with its consumers whereby it can pass on the prices. However, the scale of the price increases is such that even some of the consumers of the raw steel are beginning to complain and there is some evidence that they may be trying to find cheaper alternatives elsewhere.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman realise how the problem has become perverted? It has affected us north of the border. On my way to the airport this week, I was faced with a series of cones along the road I normally pass down because all the manholes and grids had been removed. They had clearly been sold to the scrap metal industry. Not only is the situation encouraging theft and resulting in costs to the public authorities, some scrap metal dealers are colluding in crime.

Mr. Bailey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that point. It is a somewhat bizarre manifestation of the problem; I did not realise that it had emerged north of the border. In Gloucester, 40 manhole covers have disappeared and in Cambridgeshire, 150 disappeared over only a couple of days. Even in China, bizarrely, 1,800 disappeared in Shanghai over several days. So, in China, the main manufacturing country and the driver of this increase in prices, manhole covers are being stolen and recycled, presumably to replace the manhole covers that have been stolen. The only beneficiary of that bizarre cycle of economic activity is the thief who steals them.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): I am listening with great interest to the case that the hon. Gentleman is making. Leaving aside manhole covers, does he accept that scrap metal prices are rising so steeply partly due to the sort of protectionist measures he mentioned, which are being taken in some countries? Such measures limit the international market and lead to price rises.

Mr. Bailey: Certainly, any country that takes protectionist measures and thereby limits the supply of scrap metal on the international market is contributing to the problem. However, it is fair to say that the main cause of the problem is undoubtedly China's economic expansion. Obviously, there is potential to ease some of the pressure by negotiating with countries that are restricting export and might be persuaded not to. That is an avenue that the Government should consider.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): Is that not the reason why we need the World Trade Organisation and why we need to operate within its rules?

Mr. Bailey: Yes. All the players in this situation recognise that not to operate within the limits laid down by the WTO could cause problems. We should ensure that everyone who operates in that market situation does so according to the rules, so we are bringing pressure on the Government to work through the European Union and other allies to ensure that that happens, but I shall come to that later.

I was talking earlier about the impact on the steel industry alone. I said that some consumers of raw steel products are beginning to complain, which could affect the basic steel industry itself. Furthermore, UK Steel said in a submission to me that its position would change if the United States took unilateral action to export scrap metal. In that event, UK Steel is anxious that the Government should be in a position to take immediate action.

The cast metal industry is the most affected. For example, raw materials constitute about 22 per cent. of the total costs of cast metal manufacturers, and scrap metal accounts for 60 per cent. of that figure. Price increases on the scale that I have outlined mean that prices must be increased by about 10 per cent. to cover those costs. Many companies operate on tiny margins and cannot pass on that increase, especially those with fixed price contracts. Such companies have experienced huge difficulties, which to date they have met with great resourcefulness. However, as prices continue to rise, the pressure becomes greater all the time. I am not talking about the long term, but about price increases of 10 per cent. per month, which is hugely significant for such companies.

The issue involves not only prices, but the availability of scrap metal. Some companies cannot obtain the scrap metal that they need to operate. I received an e-mail from one company that said:

"I have a buyer spending most of his time trawling the local scrap dealers to obtain adequate supplies and the prices are still rising!! As you can imagine this has also resulted in huge increases in the price of pig iron and we are still finding it very difficult to get these costs recovered in higher selling prices."

One company told me that it had come within half a day of having to stop production. I heard a tale of another company that expected a delivery of scrap metal that never arrived. When the company phoned the supplier, it turned out that somebody else had made a bid for that lorry-load of scrap while it was en route and the lorry was diverted to another manufacturer. That conveys something of the knife-edge existence that some companies endure.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): My hon. Friend says that firms are living on a knife edge, but does he accept that most in the industry suffer from the added burden imposed by the near doubling of insurance, which also makes trading difficult?

Mr. Bailey: My hon. Friend tempts me down a path. That issue has been the subject of much debate. I completely agree with him, but I hope that he will forgive me if I do not develop that point, because I am conscious that other Members want to join the debate.

Other effects will include not only pressure on the margins of companies in the cast metal sector, but increases in the prices of a range of consumer goods, particularly in the automotive industry. We could suffer from a double whammy, because if the prices of castings become too high, the automotive industry might look to other sources, including, again, China. We are looking for a level playing field, to ensure that the costs of finished castings from our local cast metal producers do not become excessively high and thereby provoke that course of action.

I conclude with some observations. I agree with the Government that the free market and international trade are extremely beneficial, and that intervening unilaterally at one point can have unintended consequences that may not be helpful to anyone. I know that the Minister has ruled out export quotas and, as one who was vociferous in his criticisms of the American Government when they introduced steel tariffs, I cannot logically argue that unilateral action is the most appropriate way forward. However, the Government must recognise that there are certain situations in which industry conditions can change so dramatically in a short period that the potential consequences are dire. That is the situation that the industry faces. If prices continue to accelerate at the current rate, the consequences could be devastating.

The European Union needs to take urgent action and work globally to pre-empt problems that affect not only this country but the whole of the EU. I am informed that about two weeks ago there was a meeting in the EU to discuss the situation and to monitor trends in the industry.

Mr. Sutcliffe: To help my hon. Friend, and because there may not be time at the end of the debate to go into enough detail on all these matters, I can tell him that the meeting was deferred.

Mr. Bailey: That reinforces the need for this debate. The industry is in such a situation that it cannot afford to have people in key positions deferring meetings.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab/Co-op): I have been a committed European all my life, but I would just like to advise my hon. Friend and the Minister that they should not place too much store in the collective commitment of the EU on these matters. I have a long memory of the EU and remember the d'Avignon plan, under which we all contributed to a reduction in steelmaking capacity in our country and throughout Europe, but Europe did not honour its commitments. We lost a great deal of capacity in this country, and I ask my hon. Friend to reflect on that fact.

I have very fond memories of Bilston steelworks. We lost that plant, which made wonderful steel for this country, 25 years ago. I ask my hon. Friend to point out to the Minister that we ought to consider production targets in this country. Looking after our own economy is crucial and we should not have to depend on so much importation.

Mr. Bailey: I thank my hon. Friend, and I would be the first to defer to his long experience in the sector, which goes beyond any experience that I have had. However, I think that he would agree that it would not benefit anyone to have any sort of international trade war. Action must be taken within a regulatory framework that is best for everyone collectively.

Monitoring is not enough. We need action, and the purpose of the debate is to convey to the Minister the depth of feeling among hon. Members who represent companies in the sector about what is to be done and the implications for the well-being of their constituencies. There is evidence that in certain areas of production, particularly coke, there are imperfections in international free trade. If we cannot do anything about price pressures on cast metal, it will bring some relief to a beleaguered industry if we can relieve such pressures in other areas. Will the Minister also consider the potential of EU industrial policies to enable assistance to be given to small and medium-sized enterprises in the sector?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): The Chair is anxious to accommodate all right hon. and hon. Members who want to contribute to the debate, and I will never complain about the brevity of contributions, but I must offer the admonishment that in this Chamber we normally start the first of the three wind-up speeches 30 minutes before conclusion. We therefore have exactly 30 minutes left for Back-Bench contributions. I ask hon. Members to take that into account when making their speeches and when accepting or responding to interventions.

10 am

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): I take note of what you say, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I had in any event intended to be brief, but I did not want the debate to be dominated by the west midlands, although I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) on securing the debate. I know that he has taken a great personal interest in the subject since he was elected, and he is a founder member and officer of the all-party group.

The issue is of concern in my constituency, where most people are still employed in manufacturing, although the number is diminishing all the time. As soon as my hon. Friend told me that he had secured the debate, I contacted two companies in my constituency to check exactly how they saw the situation. I spoke first to Stephen Gill at Lupton and Place, a company that I have visited many times. I have had a good relationship with the present boss and his father, Derek Gill, over many years, and I know about the work that they have done to enable the industry to survive through difficult times so that it is still in business now.

Steven Gill emphasised all that my hon. Friend said in his speech about the problems of scrap shortages, including the particular problems for smelters and the fact that aluminium is attracting such high prices. China is the main buyer and the main source of problems for the industry locally. The company has a battle to survive and to obtain the raw material that it needs. There is a big impact on prices. Many products that the company makes are now made in China and sold here, so there is a double whammy: they lose the raw material and are not able to sell their products, because cheap labour costs in China mean that it can outbid them.

I spoke also to Mr. Keith Taylor at Lupton Smallshaw. As a result of my conversations I intend to visit the company soon to see exactly what it does. Mr. Taylor said that the price of scrap iron has risen from £85 to £142 per tonne in 12 months; the price of nickel has doubled from £8,000 to £16,000 per tonne in four months. He mentioned China, but he also said that India is increasingly moving into the market. We all know that both India and Pakistan are enjoying GDP growth of between 8 and 9 per cent. Their economies are beginning to move ahead, and things are becoming extremely difficult, for the same reasons that they become difficult when cheap labour moves into the market. Mr. Taylor also mentioned insurance. I accept that we do not want to focus on that, but, for someone who is on a knife edge, the doubling of insurance costs can make the difference between surviving or not.

Europe was mentioned too, as it was by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner). The argument keeps coming up about Britain enforcing and honouring European regulations and commitments far more than our partners in Europe. I am a strong pro-European, like my hon. Friend, and I believe that we should have entered when the original six members signed the treaty of Rome. If we had gone in with a position of strength right at the start some things that have presented difficulties would have been different.

We want to ensure that all our partners honour European commitments and regulations exactly as we do. We want the industry to survive. I look forward the Minister responding to the debate and showing that the Government are prepared to try to ensure the industry's survival.

10.5 am

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) on securing the debate.

I start by talking about the big theme of economic globalisation and the impact on world markets of the massive industrial revolution that is taking place in China. As my hon. Friend said, the voracious demand for steel is having an impact on the price of ferrous scrap and coke. One only has to look at the figures to see that. Crude steel production in China amounted to more than 220 million tonnes in 2003, which is about a quarter of world output and double what was produced in the United States. It is also 70 per cent. more than was produced two years before.

Economic activity in the US is also increasing, which is leading to more steel production and partly to a demand for scrap. Supply, too, has been very slow to pick up. The US downturn meant that scrap, which to a degree is a by-product of economic activity, was not available, so there was pressure on demand and supply.

When, in my hon. Friend's expert opinion, does he think that the market will correct itself? When will prices either plateau or reduce? Significantly, only 40 per cent. of our scrap was exported in the late 1990s, as my hon. Friend mentioned in his opening remarks. The figure is now some 80 per cent.

The change in world market prices is also having an impact on our cast metal industry. Over the years, there have been cyclical downturns. An answer given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Alan Johnson) last June, when he was in the Department of Trade and Industry, showed that there has been a long-term downward trend in the number of foundries and in employment. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West pointed out when he opened the debate, the current crisis will have an impact on that cyclical downturn which is out of the ordinary.

Let me cite an example at the micro level. The foundry in my constituency, which is run by Thomas Dudley Ltd., was started in 1920. Yesterday, Martin Dudley, the joint managing director, gave me some figures to underline the crisis faced by the foundry. It employs 130 people and has a turnover of some £5 million. This year, that turnover will be the lowest since 1987–88. The price for ductile spheroidal graphite pig iron was £143 a tonne in December and January, but for April delivery, it is £225 a tonne—an enormous increase. The foundry anticipates that the price for delivery later in the year will be about £300 a tonne. Such a rise in prices brings enormous pressure to bear on companies. It is all very well to say that they can increase their prices to their customers, but they are bound, in important respects, to long-term contracts that have fixed prices with, say, the water industry, so they are under severe pressure.

So far, the company has been socially responsible in its actions. As I mentioned, it has long had a commitment to the area. It is a private company, so it is not subject to the stock market demands for returns of 15 or 20 per cent., which the City demands of manufacturing in this country. It has cross-subsidised the foundry from its very successful plastic moulding business. Frankly, however, it would be unrealistic to expect it to continue for long.

If the company closed, 130 jobs would be lost. The work force are multi-racial, but the unemployment caused would accentuate the black country's problem of older, unemployed white males, whose skills are not easily transferable elsewhere in the job market. Those 130 workers would pay the price for globalisation. As well as the impact on their lives and families, there would be a broader impact on the body politic. In my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West, extreme right-wing parties have a foothold and often feed on the disillusionment that comes from unemployment among that group of proud men.

What is to be done? The Under-Secretary, who is standing in for my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and the Regions, will no doubt tell us, rightly, that World Trade Organisation rules prevent us from taking unilateral action, but that does not cut much ice with people when they see other countries breaking the rules. Other countries do not seem to have the same compunction about complying with WTO rules. My hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West referred to Korea, and even the United States acted to protect its steel industry when it imposed section 201 tariffs a couple of years ago.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Surely my hon. Friend recognises that at that time the Government acted with our European partners to take the USA to the WTO.

Ross Cranston: Absolutely. My point is that other countries take unilateral action when faced with a crisis. No doubt my hon. Friend will also tell us about action that is taken with our EU partners. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) made the point that my constituents make: they are mightily under-impressed by the EU in many respects. Perhaps the Under-Secretary can give some assurance. I understand that the EU has tried to take action on the ban that Russia and Ukraine have apparently imposed to restrict the export of scrap.

I do not have the answers to the problem, but what I do know is that a family company, Thomas Dudley Ltd., is operating in my constituency under enormous pressure, and its closure would cause the loss of 130 jobs with all the implications that I mentioned briefly. I hope very much that the Under-Secretary can send me away from this debate with something substantial that I can relate to that company and its employees.

10.13 am

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): It is appropriate that I speak in this debate because I represent Ironbridge gorge, where Abraham Darby first smelted iron with coke and started the industrial revolution—

Mr. Dennis Turner: With John Wilkinson.

David Wright: Indeed; he used to be called John "Iron-Mad" Wilkinson.

I want to give a slightly different perspective to the debate and talk about the impact of prices on world-class companies. When people think of this business, they often imagine dirty plant and people working in poor conditions, but we are talking about world-class products and companies that are innovative and flexible, as they must be in a competitive world market. In Telford and Wrekin is Aga-Rayburn, which is a world leader in the production of high-quality cookers that are sold at high prices around the world. They are a world-class product. Around 850 employees work for Aga-Rayburn: 180 in my constituency at Coalbrookdale and 450 in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley). We have been working jointly with the company to try to see how it can manage the escalation of raw material prices.

It is important to point out that Aga-Rayburn has recently produced its profits table, which shows that profits are up. That is incredibly positive, but its main concern is that if there is continuing pressure on raw material prices, it may be cheaper for it to import materials and assemble the product in the UK. That is my major concern, as it may affect the 180 jobs at the Coalbrookdale foundry in my constituency. That foundry sits within 100 yd of where Abraham Darby carried out the first smelting operation. It would be terrible if the Ironbridge gorge and Coalbrookdale area were to lose it. The company has told me and my hon. Friend that it may have to consider importing panels, which are assembled into cookers, from Asia or China. The manufacturing director, Mr. O'Brien, has written to me about that.

I have also spoken to Mr. O'Brien more generally about price increases—an issue that a number of Members have already addressed. He told me that the company was paying about £70 a tonne for cast scrap in January 2003, but that that price had increased to £90 a tonne in January 2004. We have heard today that those costs have increased since then. The cost per tonne of pig iron was £127 in January 2003 and £155 in January 2004. The list goes on. We have world-class companies in the west midlands, and we are concerned that the escalation in the price of raw materials will significantly damage them.

I acknowledge the Government's position on export controls, which the Minister made clear in his interventions. I am not in favour of such controls. I have always been in favour of free trade, and I have made that clear when speaking in debates and in the public arena.

We need to consider three key themes. First, we need to challenge the nations that do operate barriers. We need to look closely, through the WTO, at what other countries are doing, in order to determine whether their actions are affecting overall price increases. We will never be able to cope with some of the economic expansion in Asia, but if other countries are applying barriers, they are falsely escalating prices, and we need to stop that.

Peter Bradley (The Wrekin) (Lab): My hon. Friend makes an important point. It is also important to realise that when we talk about scrap metal we are talking about a microcosm of the global economy. This afternoon we will debate higher education; one reason that we need world-class universities is to keep up with the investments that are being made in China and India. We are talking about keeping up not only with universities such as Harvard and Princeton, but those in China and India.

We must flex every muscle to ensure that the relevant international organisations do their jobs, not just for us in the west midlands and for scrap metal, but for every economic sector. We need also to convince our partners who have let us down in the past that it is as much in their interests as it is in ours to ensure that there is proper understanding, agreements and alliances in the global economy.

David Wright: I agree with what my hon. Friend has said. There is nothing for me to add to that.

My second point is that we need to work through the EU, and I was disappointed to hear that the EU meeting on the issue was recently deferred.

Mr. Sutcliffe: To help my hon. Friend, I can tell him that the meeting has been rescheduled for 21 April. I will talk about that in my closing remarks.

David Wright: I am grateful to the Minister. That will encourage those involved in the industry who read the record of this debate. They will look forward to hearing a report of that meeting from him or the Minister for Industry and the Regions.

My third point relates to coke prices, which are particularly significant for the industry and have increased substantially in recent months and years. Aga-Rayburn has informed me that the price per tonne of coke has increased from £140 in January 2003 to £160 in January 2004, and that it is still going up. I believe that there may be a degree of protectionism around the world regarding coke pricing. We need to use that as a bargaining tool. We must go to the table at the WTO with a wider perspective and talk not just about metal prices, but about other raw material prices that affect the industry. It would be useful if the Minister went away and considered how coke prices are affecting the industry and whether there is any action that we could take.

Mr. Pike: My hon. Friend makes a valid point on coke, production of which has been eliminated in this country. We cannot widen this discussion to a general debate on energy, but is not it true that that example should be taken as a warning not to make ourselves totally dependent on other nations for gas and other fuels in the years ahead?

David Wright: My hon. Friend is right. We need a comprehensive energy strategy, particularly for industry. Coke prices are important to the energy sector.

Liz Blackman: My hon. Friend, whom I thank for his generosity in giving way, is mapping out extremely clearly some courses of action that the Government ought to take. Does he agree that the cost of ferrous scrap is rising so swiftly that action needs to be speedy?

David Wright: I wholly agree. That is why it is incredibly important that the EU meeting takes place soon and that we rapidly communicate the results, which will influence business decisions in the coming months, to industry.

I do not believe that the situation poses a threat to jobs in my constituency at present. I certainly do not get the impression from Aga-Rayburn that there is such a threat. However, there will be a problem for world-class products such as those that the company produces if the price of raw materials increases, because the price in the marketplace also increases as the costs are directly passed on to buyers. My concern is that that is creating pressure in the United States. Aga-Rayburn sells a lot of its product there—as I said, it is a world-class business—and, as it is difficult at present to export into the US generally, price escalation on raw materials could create problems for the company. I want Aga-Rayburn to remain competitive. I have already indicated that its profits are healthy and, in the global market in which it operates, it is important that the situation is maintained.

Peter Bradley: My hon. Friend is rightly proud of Aga-Rayburn, although I point out that it smelts the metal in his constituency but makes the product in mine. He makes an important point: as the price of raw materials increases, there is pressure on either production costs or costs to the consumer. Does not Aga-Rayburn's recent record tell a tale? Perhaps it cannot compete on the cost of raw materials or even labour, but it can compete and succeed on quality. There is a lesson there for the rest of British manufacturing.

David Wright: My hon. Friend takes the words from my mouth. That was exactly the point that I was about to make in closing. Quality is crucial: we are not able to compete with the far east on labour costs, so we have to compete on quality. There is a company in Telford and the Wrekin that does just that, so let us ensure that it is able to do so for the next 10, 20 or 30 years and on into the future.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) on securing this debate. I feel passionately about the subject. Whatever is discussed in Westminster Hall, I am absolutely sure that there will not be a more important debate for the future of this country. There have been many debates in this House on the steel industry because, clearly, it is a basic industry, and our economy and world trade depend on it. As an industrial country, we neglect it at our peril.

A little bit of history does not go amiss when we discuss the steel industry and how important it is to us, so it is appropriate that we have here a Minister who will tell us about Government policy on that vital industry. I can recall the 1970s, when our steel industry was far larger than it is today. We had massive capacity—too much, I concede—and some of it had to be removed. It is imperative that a country as industrialised as the UK has a steel industry. The Government have to give careful attention to the industry's needs to maintain the country's economy and retain its wealth for the people whom we represent.

Although it is history, the second world war tells us how important the steel industry is. Within a month of the outbreak of war, Mr. Stewart of Stewart and Lloyds, the largest steel maker in the country, was wining and dining with Adolf Hitler. Quotas were allocated at that time, and the quota given to this country was far less than those given to Krupps of Germany or to Italy. We came very close to losing the second world war as a result of that allocation. It was a miracle that with those quotas we were able to produce the steel that gave us the capacity to win the conflict. That indicates the importance of the steel industry to our country.

We have now taken out a lot of the industry's capacity. We invested massively in electric arc furnaces, which have to take very clean scrap. Open hearth furnaces, which we had in this country, could be fed with any scrap, and out of that process came very special steels. The present need for clean scrap explains why we have a supply problem.

In addressing the needs of the interdependent steel, foundry and forging industries, we must ask all countries in the WTO to play their full part in planning the way in which the steel countries operate. If we can do that, we can work on an international level. We must be sure that our home production is such that we can maintain and support the industries that my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) talked about.

The steel industry has lost many thousands of jobs. Unless the matter is addressed correctly, not only by the DTI, but by all Departments, we are in danger of losing many more thousands.

10.29 am

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): This has been an interesting, topical and important debate. We clearly have a problem that has escalated over the past two years and continues to do so. In a way, the problem is due to global economic success. The main cause of that is economic expansion in China, which means economic benefits for the whole world, but leads to disruption in the process. We all acknowledge that development in China cannot be stopped, and we would not want to stop it. The question is how we accommodate it.

The point has been made that a substantial increase in economic activity in a market such as China causes strategic bottlenecks and problems with commodity prices, which international organisations may not be fully equipped to deal with. It is true, as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) said, that we were largely self-sufficient in steel in 1970, but the reduction in capacity means that nearly half our steel requirement is now imported. That situation cannot be reversed. It is probably not worth going back over the history to see why we went from there to here, but it is fair to suggest that there is a strategic reason for having sufficient capacity and not being too dependent on imports of steel or the raw materials and fuels that enable us to make it. We are, however, operating in a global market and in a privatised industry, which it is sometimes difficult for the Government to control.

That raises the issue of steel quotas and demonstrates the short-sighted folly of the American Administration in imposing them. We now hear that they may do the opposite, particularly as this is an election year, but we must remember that when steel prices were low, they sought to restrict imports to protect their domestic steel industry. I fear that it was not the EU or the WTO that led to a resolution of the problem, but domestic consumers of steel in the US who, within a relatively short period, were saying that the restriction on imports was disadvantaging their industry by forcing up the price of domestic steel products in the US market.

We now hear that the US is considering a ban on the export of scrap products, and I believe that it will shortly have the same problems as before. I have made that point several times, and I am very much at one with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the issue. The speech that she made in Mansion house a few weeks ago was bang on the button. She said that it is frustrating to deal with the US, which presents itself as the great engine of free trade but is one of the most protectionist economies in the world. We want to be persuasive, not confrontational. We should tell the Americans that trade ultimately benefits everyone, even if it creates short-term difficulties. Providing short-term, knee-jerk political solutions to commercial problems often causes more long-term damage than trying to find ways through them. All hon. Members' speeches today have suggested that we try to do the latter.

I mentioned the bizarre local impact in Aberdeenshire that I observed last week. Each week that the House sits, I drive from my house to Aberdeen airport to fly down to London. Every 50 yd for about a mile and a half along the narrow country road that I drive down are cones marking holes where drain covers had been. Such a story gets on to the national news and people think that it is a bit of a joke.

David Wright: In the west midlands, we call it tatting.

Malcolm Bruce: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that black country jibe. The cones were treated as a bit of a joke, but a local official from Aberdeen city council rightly pointed out that the removal of drain covers was extremely dangerous because it left deep holes in the road without warning. The explanation was that the soaring scrap prices were creating a market for drain covers. Apart from anything else, it would be enormously costly if that happened in every local authority area throughout the country, and we would start to see accidents and even fatalities. Although one might consider it bizarre and take a light-hearted view of it, it is a serious point.

As I said in an intervention, there is a concern that scrap metal dealers or users in this country may be colluding in that activity, and it is important that we get to the bottom of it. If one considers that scrap prices have risen, according to the figures that I have, from £49 to £122 a tonne in two years and, according to one contributor, are now rising by £10 a month, one can understand how that strange market is developing.

On many occasions, I have expressed concern about the imbalance of the British economy and in particular the weakness of manufacturing. I do not regard what is happening as anything like turning the corner, but there is evidence of a manufacturing recovery, and, if that is borne out, it is of course welcome. One indicator of recovery is an increased domestic demand for steel, and I am concerned that the international situation could constrain that recovery just as it begins.

As several Members have mentioned, we must address the issue in the EU. The most important thing is to ensure that we do not impose short-term constraints that would make the problem worse. We must consider what can be done to increase the overall supply of ore, steel, scrap and resources. It can be done. Perhaps we have been short-sighted, but we seem to have been taken aback by the impact of growth in China. We had been discussing and acknowledging it for years, but no one was evaluating what its impact would be.

I was privileged to visit India recently, and I will declare in the Register of Members' Interests that effectively my trip was paid for by the Indian Government. They wanted to show us their high-tech developing economy, which includes car making. Tata Industries in Mumbai is making the new, small, commuter Rover, the City Rover, which is an adaptation of one of their Indian-made cars. If Indian manufacturing is moving into the truck, bus, car and other metal-using markets, its increased use of steel will add to the increased use we have seen in China. It is not in our interests to discourage that or to constrain the dynamics of Indian and Chinese success; it is in our interests to find ways to accommodate it and adapt to it.

The population of India is more than 1 billion, but two thirds of the world's poorest people are in India. With 260 million people there living on less than a dollar a day, Indian expansion has a long way to go before it transforms the lives of those millions of rural poor. I would not support any policy that placed any constraint on the ability of China and India to improve the standard of living of their population.

This debate has been very good. We must address and resolve the bottleneck problem, but we must do so in a way that does not damage trade or our manufacturing recovery.

10.39 am

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): I am delighted to take part in the debate both as a spokesman for my party and as a west midlands Member of Parliament. I congratulate the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) on the way in which he presented the debate and on raising a subject of importance to the whole country as well as to the region in which he and I are Members of Parliament.

I welcome the general agreement across the Chamber on the diagnosis that the hon. Gentleman put before us. Although the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) widened the debate beyond the west midlands and the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) returned it to the west midlands, there is agreement among us on what the problem is.

One point that I had not appreciated before the debate was the extent to which there appears to be agreement among us that protectionism is not the right way to proceed and that free trade enriches all nations on the planet. That is perhaps why I, followed swiftly by the Minister, intervened on the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West, to ask him to clarify what he had said about South Korea. It was not immediately clear whether the hon. Gentleman was urging us to follow the Koreans and protect our domestic industry or whether he felt that such activity increased the world price of such commodities and should not be permitted, as I think he was suggesting.

I want to make it clear that I am an unashamed, unabashed supporter of free trade as a way of enriching some of the poorest people on the planet, to whom the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce), the spokesman for the Liberal party, referred. It is free trade that offers them the route out of poverty, not protectionism.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, West was right about the scale of the problem that he outlined. He said that the cast metal industry employs 34,000 people in the UK and produces 1.2 million tonnes of castings, with an output value of more than £2.2 billion a year. He mentioned the large number of companies involved in the business—about 580—of which 80 per cent. are SMEs and nearly half employ fewer than 50 people.

One of the key issues raised was the price of the furnace charge raw materials used by the industry. Such raw materials are all internationally traded commodities, with prices reflecting changing patterns in supply and demand on a month-by-month basis. The Cast Metals Federation has indicated that, with steelworks using a similar mix of materials, the escalation in international scrap prices is a direct result of the increase in the world demand for steel. The federation has suggested that the increase is due largely to high demand for raw materials in China, which was a point that the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North eloquently made. Another point of common agreement in the debate has been about the massive impact of China and, to a lesser extent, India on our economy and on the world economy. We have only begun to glimpse the effect of growth in China and India. They are huge economies, with high growth rates, which will have a marked effect on the world economy.

I was reminded of an incident involving a senior Chinese tax official—hon. Members may have heard about this—who recently negotiated a bilateral tax treaty with a European country. He told his interlocutor that he employed more people in his department than were resident in the country with which he was negotiating. What is happening in China will have substantial impacts on our economy and Europe's economy.

I reinforce a point that many Members will be aware of and of which I recently became aware, owing to a survey among business men that I conducted in Sutton Coldfield. There are things that the Government can do to help all businesses to deal with the costs that they face. I am talking about regulation and taxation, both of which have a direct impact on the cost base that companies face. In the west midlands there is a feeling, which I am sure Labour Members share, that southern-based decision-makers often make decisions that are southern England-centric We would like more of the Department of Trade and Industry to relocate to the west midlands so that we can connect much more directly with it and ensure that it fully understands the pivotal importance of manufacturing to our region. About 20 per cent. of jobs in the west midlands are in manufacturing and although it is understood that the number may decline in coming years, I hope that the level of manufacturing by value will not do so.

Transport is very important, and I welcome the Government's decision to make extra funds available to the west midlands. However, I urge the Minister to consider the fact that funds are made available only in a very prescriptive way and cannot, for example, be spent on road or rail. That, too, has a significant impact on the industry.

The road transport directive, which the Government are due to implement by March 2005, will also have a direct impact on the matters before us, and I am concerned about the possible threat to the cast metal industry. The directive, which will increase restrictions on the working hours of mobile workers, is likely significantly to increase costs to the industry and to those who rely on heavy goods vehicles. The Road Haulage Association estimates that the directive will cost companies at least £7,000 per driver and that operational costs in the UK will increase by £3.8 billion in 2005 and £24.8 billion in the period to 2010. The association also estimates that, at a time when it is difficult to attract and retain drivers, at least 60,000 additional drivers, and between 8,000 and 12,000 additional trucks, will be needed. The Quarry Products Association has outlined similar problems with the directive, of which I am sure that the Minister is aware. It is apparent that the directive could present a damaging threat to the industry, and I would like to be assured that the Government do not intend to gold-plate the directive, as they have seen fit to do in so many other cases.

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman will know that the directive is currently with the Department for Transport, and negotiations and consultations are taking place with the various organisations involved.

Mr. Mitchell: I am very much aware of that, but the Minister will know that the issues would be well put by his Department. I hope that he will undertake to ensure that his colleagues in other Departments understand the directive's effects, about which the industry has eloquently told us.

To conclude—hon. Members will want to hear the Minister speak for longer than me—it is important to understand the negative effects of the Government's regulation policies on industry. The Conservatives are committed to a free trade solution to the problems before us and will support the Minister in ensuring that the WTO bites, and that nations that introduce protectionist measures, which cause some of the problems outlined by the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West, are strongly encouraged to desist from implementing them. Such measures neither enhance their trade policies, as was recently shown in America, nor help the poorest people, whom we want to prosper as a result of free trade.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I thank the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) for giving me a little extra time to respond to the debate, because many issues have been raised, particularly by my hon. Friends, and I want to respond as best and as quickly as I can.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend, or rather I should say my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey)—I am sure that he will be a right hon. Friend some day—on raising this important issue. Through his involvement with the all-party group on cast metal, he has since he was elected taken the issue forward in as many ways as he can.

I am also grateful for the contributions by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston), my hon. Friends the Members for Telford (David Wright) and for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner), and the hon. Members for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) and for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell). There were also extremely important interventions from my hon. Friends the Members for Erewash (Liz Blackman) and for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley). They all showed their knowledge of this major issue. From the tone of the debate, one might think that it principally affected the west midlands, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley said, it is a national issue.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West met the Minister for Industry and the Regions recently. I am not standing in as her deputy, but as the Minister for Employment Relations, Competition and Consumers, I am aware of some of the issues that have been raised this morning in connection with jobs and the industry's culture.

I was sad that my hon. Friend should mention that Keighley castings went to the wall. It was in a constituency that neighbours mine, and I was well aware of the impact of its closure on the industry. However, I was pleased to hear that Eurotech Industries at Wednesbury has received an award. I, too, express my congratulations to the company on its excellent work in a difficult and competitive industry.

I want to talk about my foundry experience. As a 19-year-old, I applied for a job in a foundry, never having seen one before. The experience of going round it was a shock, to say the least. I have nothing but awe for those who work in the industry and for the hard work that takes place there.

As hon. Members have said, the cast metal industry lies at the centre of the United Kingdom's industrial heartland—both figuratively and geographically. It plays a crucial role in many of our key manufacturing industries, supplying cast metal components for a variety of consumer and industrial applications. It has a significant input to the automotive supply chain, which accounts for 50 per cent. of the castings produced. It is a significant employer and contributor to the UK economy.

According to official statistics, in 2002 the industry employed 24,000 people, generated a turnover of £1.65 billion, and contributed a gross value added of £708 million to the UK economy. I understand that those totals may be even higher when in-house facilities, and companies working exclusively to a specific end-user industry, are taken into account.

I listened carefully to my hon. Friend's expression of concern for the industry's future, for its employees and for the communities in which they live. I recognise that the cast metal sector remains an increasingly difficult market in which to operate. Traditional markets in UK manufacturing have globalised, and UK producers have become exposed to fierce competition from around the world. That has resulted in significant rationalisation since the mid-1980s. The sector also faces stiff competition from imports, particularly from low-cost countries such as India and the far east, where low labour costs, the exploitation of economies of scale and the latest technology have given those producers a competitive advantage.

I can well understand the industry's concern, which has been brought about by recent developments in the price and availability of raw materials, particularly ferrous scrap, which is the raw material used to produce approximately 40 per cent. of the world's steel. The availability of scrap is related to levels of industrial development. Countries such as the UK, with a long history of manufacturing, are major collectors and processors of scrap. Traditionally they are also exporters. By contrast, newly industrialising countries such as China do not have sufficient domestic supplies of scrap and must therefore import. As my hon. Friends said, it is generally known that China's steel-making capacity is increasing rapidly.

The growth in the Chinese economy, particularly in steel consumption, has been quite startling. Over the past four years, China has been responsible, either directly or through imports, for over 90 per cent. of world steel growth. According to the Iron and Steel Statistics Bureau, Chinese demand for steel increased by an estimated 22 per cent. between 2002 and 2003, and it is forecast to grow by a further 13 per cent. this year. Overall, world consumption went up by 6 per cent. in 2003, and a further rise of 6 per cent. is expected in 2004.

China currently consumes 50 million tonnes of scrap, 20 per cent. of which is imported. This year, China's imports are forecast to grow to 15 million tonnes—a 66 per cent. increase. Add to that the appetite for scrap in other countries, such as Turkey and South Korea, and the global supply becomes tight, leading to the recent unprecedented price increases.

The rapid expansion of economic activity in the far east has had a similar or even greater impact on the market for other basic materials; for example, coke, ferro-alloys and non-ferrous metals. It seems that the sheer pace of Chinese demand in recent years has caused a considerable upset to the traditional balance of supply and demand.

I accept that those developments are causing problems for all users of scrap. I acknowledge that the situation has brought about hardship for some UK cast metals producers, as they have limited scope to pass those price rises on to their customers. However, no one suggests that it is being caused by anything other than the normal operation of market forces, so I am sure that hon. Members would agree that, in the circumstances, it would be undesirable for the Government to intervene.

Mr. Mitchell: I fully understand what the Minister is saying and he is obviously righ.. Will he tell us what steps the Government are taking to raise with the South Korean Government the importance of not pursuing a protectionist agenda?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I shall come to that point. I am trying to race through my brief to deal with the points that need to be covered. I will deal with the WTO and the EU; today's debate is vital and I will give whatever answers I can. I will pass on to my hon. Friends in the DTI and the Treasury, and to the Prime Minister, information on the various negotiating routes in the EU or the WTO to ensure that the impact of today's debate, and of future meetings that hon. Friends hold with Ministers, is that we continue to work with the industries involved to find a solution.

Although we are able to diagnose the problems, the solutions are more difficult, as my hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield have said. We welcome the WTO rules and it is important to raise concerns with that body if we identify problems. We feel similarly about our EU colleagues, and the meeting on 21 April will be an opportunity to raise industry concerns and ensure that we consider what can be done. Measures have already been taken against non-EU countries that have not been playing the game.

The rate of increase in prices has been a problem for the industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley raised the issue of insurance. He will know that the Department for Work and Pensions and my Department have been considering matters such as employers liability insurance. We need to do something about that and we are having discussions on the matter. A document was published in December considering what can be done to solve some of the problems that industry faces.

The hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield said that the matter was all about the burden of regulations; I do not accept that. I do not have time to issue the challenge that I normally issue to Opposition Members: to name which particular employment regulations they do not wish to apply to UK workers which are available in the rest of Europe.

As a member of the European Community, the UK is not able to take unilateral action on trade matters. Decisions that impact on or affect the European Community's commercial policy are taken collectively by the European Commission and member states working closely together. We are liaising closely with the Commission on that important issue.

To obtain a fuller understanding of the issues we have asked the Commission to prepare an analysis of the impact on the European industry of the current ferrous scrap price trends. That document is due to be discussed in Brussels on 21 April. The UK will ensure that the matter is handled with the seriousness that it deserves. We are aware that Eurofer, the trade association representing the interests of European steel-makers, has proposed the establishment of a monitoring system for Community exports of ferrous scrap, but we understand that that has been rejected.

We are aware that certain sectors of the US steel industry are experiencing difficulties similar to those in the UK. The Government are also aware of rumours that the US Administration are contemplating some form of initiative to restrict or limit scrap exports. I can inform my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West that as of today no such steps have been taken by Washington. We are not aware of any specific proposal from the US industry. We shall continue to monitor the situation in the US and elsewhere closely.

Hon. Members can rest assured that the Government will take all necessary steps, within the WTO and elsewhere, to secure the removal of any measure taken by the US or any of our other trading partners to limit scrap exports. In our view it is in the best interests of all stakeholders that an open and transparent global market for ferrous scrap is maintained. It is important that we respect the free trade rules of the WTO. We did so when the US took the action that it did under section 201.

The debate has been vital, but there is a long way to go. It was important that my hon. Friend raised it in the way that he did. I shall write to hon. Members about the issues that I have not been able to address to ensure that they know what the Government are doing about this important issue. I shall ensure that there is no underestimation of the Government's—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must turn our attention now to the next topic on which we must focus today, which concerns the death of Mr. Steven Fitzsimmons.

Mr. Steven Fitzsimmons

11 am

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South) (Lab): This is an occasion that I wish that none of us had to participate in. However, it is an opportunity to express my sincere condolences to the family of Steven Fitzsimmons. I thank the Minister and her staff for all the work that has been undertaken between my making a request for this Adjournment debate and today's debate. I have found the staff and the Minister most helpful.

When Mrs. Fitzsimmons first came to see me, I treated the matter as one of a mother grieving for her lost son, but on the basis of the inquiry, as it unfolded, and all the information that came my way, I began to have doubts about some aspects of the case and some of the notes that had been taken. It is that issue that I want to concentrate on this morning.

As I understand it, Steven Fitzsimmons left Irvine to watch his two favourite teams play in a testimonial game. Celtic were playing Manchester United. He travelled by train from Irvine and got on a train at Glasgow going to Manchester at 12.30 pm on 31 July. Apparently, he travelled by train and not on the Celtic supporters bus because he had a twisted spine, for which I understand that he was taking quite a degree of medication. He stayed overnight at the house of Brian Gallagher's mother, Irene Gallagher, who lives in Manchester at 226 Graeme street.

The next morning—the morning of 1 August and the day of the match itself—according to Mrs. Gallagher's statement, Steven got up at 8 am, had his breakfast, went for a shower and at 11 am went outside to lie in the sun. According to Mrs. Gallagher's statement, at 2 pm her nephew, Jack Gallagher, and Brian Gallagher, with whom Steven had travelled from Irvine, moved Steven from the right hand side of the garden to the left hand side since it was a very hot day. They put Steven in the shade to prevent him from getting sunburn. She said:

"They lifted him and he just made a few groaning noises."

They left him. The first question that arises is: why did they leave him? Why did they not try to do more? Alarm bells should have been ringing at that point.

Steven had, after all, a ticket for the game. That is now a proven fact. As I understand it, he went to see Kenny McCleary, who is the Irvine Celtic supporters club secretary, some two to three days before the game and collected his ticket from him, paying him £21. I have all the verification of that; it is not in doubt. Mrs. Gallagher says in her statement:

"At 18.15 hours that day I got in a taxi from my home address to go to Old Trafford"— the locus of the football game—

"to watch the match. Steven was still in the garden".

I think that almost bizarre. We are talking about a boy who has come all the way down from Irvine to watch the game. He has got a ticket and they know that, yet they leave him to lie in the garden and Mrs. Gallagher goes off to the football game.

At approximately 23.15, a neighbour, Mr. Neil McGowan Frame, who had been babysitting for Mrs. Gallagher's grandson, who had travelled down from Irvine as well, apparently calls an ambulance. That happened five hours after Mrs. Gallagher had left by taxi. To give him his due, the man had tried to wake Steven on a number of occasions, but he had failed. Again, one has to pose the question why he did not react more quickly.

I also want to know about the conversations between Mr. Frame, Mrs. Gallagher, Brian Gallagher and others. There is no record of them whatsoever. One would have thought that there would have been in such circumstances. However, we just do not know what those conversations were.

One would also have thought that much more would have happened than did. Action should have been taken and more assistance given. One thing that is certain is that it was subsequently discovered that Steven Fitzsimmons's ticket for the game was not on his person. No adequate check has been made to establish whether it was used. Money and jewellery, Mrs. Fitzsimmons alleges, were missing, never to be found. Steven Fitzsimmons died as a consequence of events that are unexplained.

Brian Gallagher does not appear from the record to have been interviewed by the police at the time or subsequently. PC Picton's statement of 22 February 2004 states:

"I have attempted to contact Brian Gallagher to ask him about Steven Fitzsimmons' ticket. I have liaised with Irvine police in Ayrshire who attended Brian Gallagher's last known address on my behalf. He no longer lives at the address and unfortunately there is no forwarding address for him. Gallagher's mother states that she has no contact details for her son."

Again, that seems strange, almost bordering on the bizarre. The question has to be asked: why not? I am sure that had Brian Gallagher been interviewed, most if not all the outstanding issues that pose questions and have no answers, so far as Mrs. Fitzsimmons is concerned, would have been addressed. Today's debate would perhaps not have been required.

There were also other discrepancies. The adult post-mortem report, under clinical history, indicated

"following alcohol and drug intake".

However, the subsequent toxicological report stated "negative for alcohol". Why the discrepancy? Steven Fitzsimmons was diagnosed as having consumed a cocktail of drugs, including methadone. Where did he get the methadone? I have asked Home Office officials to try to establish that. I do not know whether there are any answers, but I know one thing for certain. Having talked to some of those in the medical profession locally who knew him, including his GP, I know that none of them was aware that Steven was prescribed methadone, and there is no record of it having been prescribed. It is my understanding that methadone is normally prescribed and taken on premises, so I do not know how the methadone got into the person as established by the reports. One has to pose the question of where Steven got that methadone.

Mrs. Helen Fitzsimmons, Steven's mother, believes that foul play took place. One can see why, because of the unanswered questions, although one could easily apply the science of the conspiracy theory. We need to get to the bottom of this, to establish what the facts were, and we need a remedy to answer all the questions to satisfy Helen Fitzsimmons in part.

As a remedy, I would suggest that we look at the whole question of some kind of investigation, say by the coroner, that would reopen the case and establish the reasons for death and the answers to some of the questions. Why do we need that? Well, the facts as we know them need to be explained. The suspicions of the boy's mother need to be addressed. I am looking forward to the Minister's answers and I also want to know something about what action is likely and how, some two to three years after the event, this outstanding matter can be resolved.

11.10 am

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I am very grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe) for raising this matter and expressing his concerns about the death of Steven Fitzsimmons. He has raised important questions and I shall do my best to deal with them. However, clearly those matters do not necessarily concern the Home Office directly. They are also the preserve of Greater Manchester police and the coroner.

It is, of course, important that family and friends can have confidence in the answers that they are given following the tragic death of a loved one. I hope that today's debate will assist in bringing comfort and reassurance to Mrs. Fitzsimmons and Steven's family and friends. I entirely understand that, while these matters are in the air, it is difficult for Mrs. Fitzsimmons, in particular, to feel a sense of confidence in relation to the issues surrounding her son's death.

During any investigation it is for the police to determine their lines of inquiry. They are the arbiters of the most reasonable way to conduct an inquiry. It is part of their operational discretion. I know that my hon. Friend is fully seized from his own experience of the relationship between the Home Office, the police and the police authorities.

When there is a death requiring an inquest, the coroner may guide the police in their inquiries and instruct them to make any inquiries that he or she considers necessary to inform the inquest before a decision is reached on the cause of death. That is what happened in this case, so the coroner has been fully involved.

It would not be appropriate for me to offer comment or make a judgment on decisions taken by the police or the coroner. There are lines of investigation and review for both of them. However, I am conscious that there have already been numerous communications between my hon. Friend and Greater Manchester police, so that much of what I say now may not be new to him. I hope, nevertheless, for a better understanding between us of the remaining issues.

The coroner's verdict was of accidental death and I am informed by Greater Manchester police that they remain satisfied that that was an appropriate verdict. However, the Manchester coroner has agreed that if my hon. Friend or indeed Mrs. Fitzsimmons make any inquiries of the coroner's office, the coroner will seek to provide any information that might be helpful.

If Mrs. Fitzsimmons is dissatisfied with the outcome of the inquest and the verdict of accidental death, it is of course open to her to seek a fresh inquest. That is the appropriate route to take in such circumstances. It is possible for an application to be made to the High Court under section 13 of the Coroners Act 1988, with the authority of the Attorney-General. I would recommend that if such action is being considered, Mrs. Fitzsimmons and my hon. Friend should be informed by discussions with the coroner and by appropriate legal advice.

It is, of course, understandable that loose ends in any case lead to concern and distress for the parties involved, so I shall try to deal with the issues raised by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Donohoe: May I establish whether there is a cost implication to the applications that would be needed to have the case reopened?

Ms Blears: If an application were to proceed to the High Court, I am sure that Mrs. Fitzsimmons would need legal representation, so it would be necessary to explore the possibility of obtaining legal aid or whatever assistance might be available. That is why I would advise Mrs. Fitzsimmons to discuss the matter first with the coroner's office, if she is considering such action, to establish the basis on which it could be pursued, and to obtain initial legal advice before embarking on the significant course of reopening the inquest and seeking a fresh verdict. She may well not want to pursue that course of action, provided she gets answers to some of the issues raised by my hon. Friend. That is the appropriate legal route to challenge the verdict of accidental death if she really believes that that was an inappropriate verdict.

I appreciate the concern that Steven was apparently in the company of other people for a considerable time before it was recognised that anything was wrong and an ambulance was called. I am unable to offer a comment on the circumstances of that, but my hon. Friend was right to raise the issue of what had happened to Steven during the day and in the evening, and that an ambulance was not called until quarter past 11 at night. Those are matters of concern, but I am informed by Greater Manchester police that they still hope to speak to Steven's friend, Brian Gallagher, who was present. They are happy to keep my hon. Friend informed if they can answer any specific questions about what happened in the chronology of events on that day.

I am informed that Mr. Gallagher is not at this time suspected of offences by Greater Manchester police, but they tell me that he has been registered on the police national computer in an attempt to locate him. As my hon. Friend said, Mrs. Gallagher says that she does not have a forwarding address and it is important that Greater Manchester police continue to try to find him with the purpose of interviewing him about Steven's death. He clearly spent a considerable amount of time with Steven, so it is important that the police interview him.

Greater Manchester police are also pursuing enquiries with the Benefits Agency to try to locate Brian. Irvine police have made attempts to locate him by following up his last known address. A great deal of work is going on and the matter has not been laid to rest. Inquiries are ongoing, and I hope that that is some comfort to Mrs. Fitzsimmons.

At this point, Steven's friend is not a suspect, so the police must be very careful about how they approach Brian Gallagher if he is to provide information that is useful. He may well be fearful of speaking to the police at this point and if my hon. Friend has further information that could be useful to the police, I urge him to share that with them. It is important that the interview takes place and that information is gathered about exactly what happened to Steven on that day if it is to be of assistance to Mrs. Fitzsimmons.

My hon. Friend referred to Steven's match ticket and I understand that there is an issue about missing jewellery. I am informed by Greater Manchester police that both Manchester United and Celtic football clubs have been contacted about the match ticket. Unfortunately, neither club has the means to confirm whether Steven's ticket was used. Inquiries have been made and the clubs have pursued the matter, but presumably neither of them has an information technology system that is able to trace the number of the ticket. At this point, we cannot confirm whether the ticket was used by any other person to gain access to the match.

Property inquiries have also been made at the Manchester royal infirmary, the bereavement centre, the mortuary and the cashiers office, but there are no records relating to the missing property. Again, I assure Mrs. Fitzsimmons that Greater Manchester police made inquiries with all those bodies to see whether the missing jewellery could be found, but, at the moment, there are no records.

The mother of Brian Gallagher has been interviewed. As my hon. Friend said, she occupies the house in which Steven stayed the night before his death. She was unable to provide any further information about whether the ticket had been used or what had happened to the jewellery, so she was unable to give that information to the police.

It seems that the key to providing the answers to many of the questions about this matter is with Steven's friend. His interview is crucial and efforts to trace and interview him are still ongoing. I will ensure that my hon. Friend is kept informed as those inquiries develop and provided with any new information about what happened that day.

My hon. Friend raised the important issue of the coroner's findings on drugs and alcohol. I am informed that the toxicology report referred to a cocktail of drugs—cocaine, methadone, cannabis and benzodiazepines—in Steven's body. At this stage, no one knows where the methadone came from, and my hon. Friend believes that it may be possible to contact the relevant health board to find records of the possible source.

If my hon. Friend wishes to pursue the matter, it would be a good idea to get in touch with the coroner, who published the findings of the post-mortem and toxicology screen. The coroner was contacted by my officials and said that he would be happy to provide any further information that he can about the circumstances surrounding Steven's death. For Mrs. Fitzsimmons's sake, it would be a good idea to get in touch with him to discuss the findings and try to ascertain the reason for the initial reference to alcohol that was then not substantiated by the medical tests. That would be a fruitful course of action for my hon. Friend to follow, and I am sure that he will do so.

I have little further to add, other than to express my sincere condolences to Steven's mother, family and friends for their tragic loss. I entirely understand that, because there are still loose ends, Mrs. Fitzsimmons feels that it is difficult to close the case. The fact that the death occurred at a distance from the rest of the family—Steven was hundreds of miles away in the company of others—has caused real problems for them. I hope that the further inquiries of the Greater Manchester police, particularly the interview with Brian Gallagher, will bear fruit and bring reassurance to the family. I also hope that the discussions with the coroner will result in progress and give the family reassurance that the matter has been dealt with properly.

Mr. Donohoe: Can my hon. Friend the Minister give some indication, if not today perhaps by contacting my office later, as to who to contact in the coroner's office? The information that I have gives two or three names, and it is difficult to track down the person to contact.

Ms Blears: I am more than happy to provide that information. I said at the outset of the debate that it would be inappropriate for me to comment on operational decisions of the coroner and the police, but I believe that it is appropriate for me to facilitate my hon. Friend's pursuing the matter on behalf of his constituent. As this is an important constituency case, I shall ensure that my officials and I do everything that we can to provide information and assistance to him. We shall get in touch with his office with the names of the relevant contacts and do whatever we can to facilitate a meeting so that the matter can be properly and thoroughly explored.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend raised this extremely important issue, and I hope that we are able to help the family to achieve some resolution of the outstanding matters. I am grateful to him for the manner in which he has pursued this difficult and potentially contentious issue. His co-operation with all the authorities involved will lead to a better resolution.

Horse Exports

2 pm

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Good afternoon, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I begin by declaring an interest. I was brought up with and around ponies; I am today the proud owner and part owner of two horses; and I am actively in the market for a suitable little shaggy pony for my four-year-old daughter. So, I cannot pretend to come to this debate from a dispassionate and objective viewpoint.

I feel very strongly about this issue and so should anyone concerned with not only riding, but the wider agenda of animal welfare. I find the prospect of the live export of British horses and ponies to the meat trade of continental Europe an abomination. Although we can be encouraged by the noises emanating from Strasbourg yesterday, we must be in no doubt that the resumption in the trade must be stopped. The Government will ignore the growing anger of thousands of horse lovers at their peril.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): The hon. Gentleman and other Members know that the Government's objective is to prevent the development of a trade in live horses for slaughter. Will he explain why he thinks that one might emerge?

Gregory Barker: I am sorry, but I am not at all clear about what the Minister is getting at. I do not think that we disagree about the Government having an objective, however like so many things with this Government, they have targets and objectives but they are very rarely met. We are concerned to ensure that the objective is met and that before the current regime is ended, there is a strong, reliable and robust regime in place. I had exactly that concern last Friday when a Minister in the Department for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs failed to turn up for my debate on GM crops. In a way, that is a totally separate issue, but it is in fact similar. The Government may share the objectives but everyone concerned must be sure that the objectives are robust and will be followed through.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Alun Michael: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): Order. This is not a bar room. Will you indicate to whom you are relinquishing the Floor, sir?

Gregory Barker: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray).

Mr. Gray: I was going to suggest to my hon. Friend an answer that he might have given the Minister. Does my hon. Friend agree that not allowing a market in horses to develop on the continent of Europe is quite different from introducing an absolute, outright ban, which is what we seek?

Gregory Barker: That is the point, and I am sure that the Minister will respond when he has a chance a little later.

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman asked about whether the Government have objectives. The answer is yes, and we deliver on them. We are delivering on the objective of preventing the development of a trade in horses for slaughter. That is the priority, rather than giving an appearance of dealing with the issue, which is the great risk.

Gregory Barker: I do not want to pre-empt our hour-and-a-half debate by jumping around from issue to issue. I am sure that the Minister will address those points, but perhaps we may continue in a more logical fashion.

I pay tribute to the remarkable and tireless campaign conducted on behalf of horses and ponies throughout the country by my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire. His arrival at the Houses of Parliament today mounted on a fine-looking horse is just the latest of his efforts to raise the public's awareness of what could be an impending disaster for British horses. He also hosted an excellent International League for the Protection of Horses reception to highlight the dangers of impending changes.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) has been equally tenacious in the battle to get the Government to see sense and stand up for British horses and ponies—he even took the issue up with the Prime Minister in the House last week.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): My hon. Friend is very kind. Does he agree that I was right to be surprised when the Prime Minister did not provide an immediate answer to my question, but had to write to me subsequently? Only a few weeks earlier, he had received a 60,000-signature petition on that very question.

Gregory Barker: My hon. Friend's point is extremely well made. The Minister says that the Government have objectives, but last Wednesday the Leader of the Government was totally oblivious to that big campaign and the serious and deeply felt worries of horse and pony owners. That is why those of us who are concerned about animal welfare are worried.

Whatever warm words the Minister comes up with, the matter has not even registered on the Government's agenda and may be bumped out of the way by other priorities and crises as they come along. We are here today, first and foremost, to put the matter at the heart of the Government's agenda for the next 12 months. We must ensure that they do not get distracted, that they take the matter seriously and that they listen to the concerns of horse and pony lovers throughout the country.

Like my hon. Friends the Members for North Wiltshire and for New Forest, West, I believe that hundreds of thousands of people throughout the kingdom, regardless of political persuasion—I am pleased to see Members from other political parties here today to voice their concern—would find it unforgivable if the Government allowed the resumption of horsemeat trading to sneak through. That trade was stamped out by Stanley Baldwin's Government back in the 1930s.

The horse holds a special place in the affections of the British people, particularly our children. Pony ownership is not the preserve of a privileged few, but a sport and hobby for hundreds of thousands of people. Indeed, for many young families, it is a way of life, and financial sacrifices are often made to keep the family pony. A wonderful informal network ensures that elderly ponies are often passed from generation to generation and to new young riders, often for next to nothing except a guarantee that a much-loved family friend will be cared for and looked after responsibly by its new owners. In that way, thousands of families—many of limited means—can enjoy all the fun, happiness and responsibility of owning a pony.

That happy status quo is threatened by the exposure of Britain's ponies to the predatory and insatiable demand of the continental horsemeat market. The market for horsemeat in Europe is not a figment of the British imagination, nor a product of Europhobia. Every year, about 165,000 horses are subjected to horrific journeys, travelling thousands of miles to the EU from eastern Europe or being transported long distances within the rapidly expanding EU, which now stretches from the Baltic to the Atlantic. They are frequently transported in appalling conditions with little or no water or rest, only to be slaughtered when they reach their final destination. The majority of those horses are destined for Italy, which annually imports between 85 and 95 per cent. of Europe's market in live horses. We must not allow our British horses and ponies to suffer the same fate.

Let me remind you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, of the basis of the current rules governing the export of ponies and horses.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I thank the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene before he moves on. I entirely support what he and the hon. Member for North Wiltshire are trying to do. I apologise, as I shall not be here for the rest of the debate—I have to chair the Select Committee inquiry on milk. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it is no good isolating the live export of horses and that we should campaign strongly against the export of all livestock that goes from these shores and elsewhere in Europe? I hope that the Opposition also take up that cause.

Gregory Barker: The hon. Gentleman makes a sensible point, but I want to concentrate on the clear danger facing us today from the live export of horses. I am grateful for his cross-party support, which is much appreciated.

The Exportation of Horses Act 1937 forbade the export of live horses under a certain value from our shores. The minimum limit was deliberately set well above the carcase value and the Act has successfully prevented UK horses from being exported live for slaughter. The European Union granted a dispensation to the UK for that to continue after the creation of the Common Market. That dispensation expired in 1995, but remained part of UK law. Unfortunately, it seems that the Government will not again seek the derogation that we acquired in 1995 with the result that the minimum value legislation is in danger of being lost in the European courts. The overall effect of that would be to allow ponies and horses of any value to be exported from the UK for slaughter. We must not allow that to happen.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): My hon. Friend is putting the case eloquently, but there is one area that concerns me: the indigenous horses of Exmoor, Dartmoor and Bodmin moor, which do not have any protection at all because nobody owns them. They are herded and used for overseas trade. Does he think that we should pressure the Government to close that loophole as well?

Gregory Barker: My hon. Friend makes a good point, and I know that he probably speaks for the whole west country in raising that issue. I do not for one minute pretend that the minimum value legislation is a satisfactory regime for caring for horses and limiting the trade in live exports in the 21st century. It is without doubt in need of updating, and we need better legislation to govern the welfare of horses, but as things stand it is the only game in town and we do not want those protections for horses to go without having something equally robust, if not better and more appropriate, in their place.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is certainly making a strong case. He mentioned the debate in Europe yesterday and the agreement to accept an amendment with regard to the draft regulation that will go before Ministers in April. Has he sought advice, or made any assessment, in respect of a comparison between the likely impacts of that amendment and of the Government's proposed solution regarding trained-to-halter restrictions for live exports?

Gregory Barker: I have still to see the full details and to be briefed fully on this matter, but from what I have seen that route seems far better than the rather unsatisfactory DEFRA proposition. I would like DEFRA to grip the opportunity with both hands. There is obviously a great distance between cup and lip when it comes to taking up the proposition from Europe, but I understand that there is no fundamental barrier to prevent Britain from going for it.

Mr. Gray: Perhaps I can assist my hon. Friend—this comes hot-foot from Strasbourg. I understand that the amendments state that it would be perfectly possible for member states to "ban exports of certain species for moral reasons."

They would also allow a total national ban

"on the export of live equidae . . . for production or slaughter".

I am pleased to tell him that in response to those amendments Commissioner Byrne said last night that the Commission supports stricter national rules:

"I am pleased that this would effectively maintain the UK's restriction on the export of horses destined for human consumption".

So, the European Parliament and the European Commission are happy for us to go ahead with the ban.

Gregory Barker: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making the point so clearly. What we can be sure of is that the current DEFRA muddle is the least satisfactory alternative to the minimum value legislation. I hope that DEFRA grips this opportunity from Europe and takes it forward in the manner he suggests.

Alun Michael: While we are seriously considering clarity, has the hon. Gentleman examined what the current regulations ban? They do not, for instance, provide a ban of the sort that Commissioner Byrne seems to think they do. Will the hon. Gentleman explain the moral grounds on which a ban might be founded? It is important to understand the principles of the approach that he is adopting. He is wrong to say that the opportunity is not being gripped by DEFRA; it is being gripped very firmly. However, we need to get at the principles that underlie the way forward and he is right to say that there is a need for the regulations to be updated.

Gregory Barker: If the Minister allows me, that will emerge in my speech, which I am trying to make. I will make some progress, but if, towards the end of my remarks, he feels that I have not covered that point I will happily return to it. To summarise, we need something that specifically addresses the welfare of horses and is not just a by-product of European legislation.

The situation with regard to the live export of horses is further complicated by the imposition of horse passports. Last weekend, to help to prepare my speech, I visited the Brown Bread horse rescue centre in the village of Ashburnham in my constituency. The trustee of the centre, Tony Smith, showed me and my daughter around the site, which does fantastic work in rescuing and looking after unwanted horses and ponies from all around East Sussex and well beyond. The centre has even taken in ill-treated animals from as far away as Greece.

From June, however, sanctuaries and retirement and rescue centres, such as the wonderful Brown Bread centre, will come under massive financial threat from the Government's bureaucratic horse passport scheme, which could drive them out of existence. A lot of people do not realise what a shoestring such operations work on. They have the most minuscule of budgets and there is no flexibility to accommodate a sudden surge in costs. Mr. Smith is subsidising the centre out of his own pocket.

Those centres are so worried because, technically, horse passports are being introduced to protect humans who consume horsemeat by ensuring that records are kept of the drugs that horses have been given to prevent those chemicals from being passed on into the human food chain. As horse passports are designed to protect humans rather than equines, they do not fall under the remit of equine charities. That presents charities such as the Brown Bread sanctuary with serious difficulties. About 80 horses and ponies at Brown Bread will require horse passports and many other similar sanctuaries will face such struggles to fund the cost of the new regulations.

To sanctuaries such as Brown Bread, the cost of up to 80 horse passports will be a huge financial strain. The total cost of completing a passport can easily pass £50 or £60. Although the passport costs a lot less than that, the cost of the various consultations and of implementing the paperwork required makes the total much bigger than the initial cost of the passport suggests.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that setting up passport schemes is immensely complex and difficult? In the cattle passport scheme, 100,000 cattle were lost at a cost of £15 million a year, according to the National Audit Office. The horse passport scheme will be hugely difficult, but it would be unnecessary if we kept the ban.

Gregory Barker: I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend, who draws a good example giving a major reason why people in the horse world are so worried by this latest bureaucratic initiative from the Government.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Gregory Barker: Certainly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. George Osborne.

Mr. Cameron: David Cameron, actually, Mr. Deputy Speaker. A dangerous mistake is made.

Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a similarity between the issues of horse passports and of the live export of horses? In each case, we are asking the Minister to take a robust stance on behalf of British horse owners and this country. He must stand up for Britain on horse passports and say that they should not be compulsory because we do not need them. He should also say that we will maintain our current position of a virtual moratorium on live exports.

Gregory Barker: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is a keen horseman. He speaks with his usual authority and is absolutely spot on.

The passports will load costs on to the informal market in ponies, to which I alluded earlier, which could serve to drive the animals out of the reach of those young families who want to offer them a temporary home and into the arms of those seeking to buy them to make a quick profit by selling them on to the meat trade. I find it extraordinary that a Government—and, indeed, a Minister—who are prepared to risk a constitutional crisis over foxhunting can be so blind on such a burning and immediate issue of animal welfare.

Only by opposing the export of live horses will we show proper care and respect for horses and properly fulfil the cultural traditions and desires of the British public. We must support the hundreds of thousands of horse and pony lovers in Britain. The Government must persuade the European Parliament and other member states to allow the UK to continue to prohibit the export of all equines for slaughter. They will find that if they do they are pushing at an open door, if they are sufficiently robust and clear about what they are trying to achieve. We need regulations that are right for the 21st century. If that will not work, we must be prepared to take unilateral action to preserve our horses and pets.

Moreover, by aligning our rules with those of the EU, we would do something that runs contrary not only to the interests of horses, but to the sentiments of the British public. In British culture, the horse is regarded as a companion animal, not a meat source. That goes back to the Minister's point about the moral argument that underpins my case.

In Britain, the horse is a greatly loved companion, not something that we like to see on the table. We do not eat horsemeat in the UK. We understand, of course, that other cultures have different customs and that some people eat horsemeat. We must respect those customs in so far as they do not cause harm to others, but I strongly believe that the British public would be horrified if we allowed our horses, even by default or with the best of intentions, to join the harrowing horse slaughter trade, in which economics dictates that noble creatures suffer a long, terrifying and degrading final journey.

Andrew George: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the EU regulations must be tightened up with regard to journey times and the welfare of animals, irrespective of the country to which or from which the horse or pony is being transported? The issue affects not just the EU.

2.21 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

2.36 pm

On resuming—

Andrew George: I shall continue my intervention, on which I expect the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) will have sought advice. It is important that there should be controls in EU regulations on absolute journey times and welfare, not only of ponies and horses transported within Europe, but of those brought to Europe for human consumption.

Gregory Barker: I wholeheartedly concur with the hon. Gentleman. Obviously, with enlargement very much upon us, the European Union is that much bigger and the journey time from, for example, the Baltic states or Poland to southern Italy is very long indeed. I am worried not only that the current regulations are not strong enough, but that they are rarely enforced. We must be concerned about proper regulations and proper enforcement.

Mr. Paterson: My hon. Friend should not hang his hat too much on the benefits of a European directive to limit journey times, as the markets for the animals are nearly all well beyond the eight to nine hours travelling time that the European Union is discussing. I believe that the main markets for horses are in southern Italy, for salami. He is absolutely right to mention regulations, but even regulations for a nine-hour journey would not be adequate, as the journey times are much longer than that.

Gregory Barker: That is another very good point.

Mr. Gray: I am deeply sorry to correct my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), but the European Union proposal is not that there should be a time limit for the journey, but that there should be a gap. The animals would remain on the lorry for a short time to rest, then the journey would recommence. It is perfectly possible that the horses could be on the lorry for many days, albeit with rests in the meantime.

Gregory Barker: I am grateful for that clarification. Either way, we would not wish such a trade or fate on

[Gregory Barker]

British horses and ponies. I hope that we use our influence in Europe to get a derogation to prevent our horses and ponies from being shipped to Europe. Even so, we must be equally robust in Brussels in arguing for strong restrictions on the transport times and in levering up the welfare regulations. I hope that the Minister is taking note of the very strong feelings on the issue.

In short, we must recognise the divergence of cultural habits and traditions between the UK and other European countries, and ensure that the law reflects it, but that cannot be at the expense of horse and pony welfare. It would be a travesty if an attempt to harmonise European legislation meant watering down the regulations on horses.

I have not come here with an inflexible proposition. There are different ways in which the Minister could tackle the problem, but we need far greater clarity and a much more direct approach from the Government. We must continue to prohibit the export of live horses for slaughter, and we must do that by front-door regulation, not by thinking that we can play about and achieve those ends by tinkering with other rules and regulations. I fear that that is what he has in mind.

I want a bold, clear-cut prohibition of the live export of horses and an improvement on the current system. The challenge for the Government is to be clearer, more robust and more straightforward in how they tackle the issue.

Ministers have said that the minimum value legislation that underpins the system will not be repealed until something is in place that is equally robust in law, which will either maintain or improve the protection for our horses. I hope that the Minister takes this opportunity to give the House, and the country at large, a cast-iron guarantee that that is the case and that he takes the clear route that seems to have been offered by Commissioner Byrne and the European Parliament, rather than the more complex route that DEFRA has pursued to date.

In an intervention, the Minister asked what is so different, in welfare terms, about horses and ponies. He shakes his head, but when he addressed the moral question he asked what is different about the moral issue of animal welfare. I promised to come back to him on that before I finished speaking.

Alun Michael: I may have misunderstood what the hon. Gentleman has just said, but I did not ask about the difference between horses and ponies. Is that what he says I said?

Gregory Barker: No, no—not the difference between horses and ponies, but the difference in our culture and the moral difference as between horses and ponies and other types of animal. The Minister shakes his head, but I think that the record will show that that was the gist of his intervention.

Alun Michael: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Gregory Barker: Let me complete my speech, because we are getting into a rather scrappy exchange.

Horses and ponies are an integral, almost unique, part of the British way of life and our culture. They appear in our literature, film, folklore and works of art, and they are an incredibly important part of our pastimes, sports and recreation. We are a nation of horse lovers and we need to recognise that the horse occupies a special place in this country—beyond that which it occupies in other European nations. That is why we need a derogation and an extra guarantee, and that is why our ponies and horses must be protected.

Alun Michael: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Gregory Barker: I shall allow the Minister to reply fully in his own time, as I am reaching my peroration.

We must send a clear and unequivocal message from this debate to the meat traders of continental Europe that Britain's horses and ponies must be kept off the menu. We want a clear solution to the problem and we will do whatever is necessary to maintain the current situation.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Whereas we would normally commence the first of the three winding-up speeches at 3 o'clock, we must now do so at 3.15 pm to allow for injury time. I hope that hon. Members bear that time limitation in mind when they make their contributions and accept interventions, of which there have been many, or respond to them, which has taken even longer.

2.44 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) on securing this important debate on a subject that touches the hearts of many people in Britain. I hope that we continue to push this campaign over the coming years.

The British people have a special relationship with horses and, indeed, dogs. As my hon. Friend explained, they are companion animals, not meat animals. We simply do not eat them. In that, as in so many other things, we are quite different from the French, and from other continental countries, to which I say, "vive la différence".

This is a matter of improper and unnecessary interference from the European Union. The EU Commission decision 200/68 is a disgraceful imposition on this country. Yet again we see new Labour eager to pander to the EU and its regulations and centralised control in a way that the people of this country increasingly seek to resist.

The horse passport is a disgraceful regulation. It is simply being pursued to feed the cruel and poorly regulated European slaughterhouses—largely to provide horsemeat for the salami trade, which is something that people in this country find repugnant. We should seek to stop the live export for slaughter of all animals from this country, not seek to extend it to horses. There are two clear reasons for that. The first is moral, but the second is economic and that has not yet been mentioned today.

The moral reason circles around animal welfare. My hon. Friend spoke eloquently about the animal welfare issues. I know that our Front-Bench spokesman will be focusing on it, so I will say no more about it so as to be brief, as you requested, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The second issue is that of sound economics. We need to support the added value on the slaughter and provision of animals for food in this country. The export of live animals for slaughter is equivalent to exporting British jobs. I do not want to see this new Labour Government export any more British jobs to continental Europe, even though they consistently seek to do so.

Public opinion is clear on the issue. They want the export of live horses for slaughter to be prohibited. Anything less will be yet another reason for my constituents, like those of many other hon. Members, to seek to vote the new Labour Government out at the next general election.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is time for a small explanation and a large apology. Due to a foul up by our intelligence services, I am afraid that I must apologise to the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) for getting his name wrong. On this occasion, I call Mr. David Cameron.

2.47 pm

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I quite understand. The mistake has also been made by Mr. Speaker. If he can make it, it is quite acceptable for his deputies to do so as well.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) on raising an important issue. He has done so with a great combination of reasonableness and passion. I know that, as a keen horseman, he will be riding in his first point to point over the Easter break. Conservative Members do not want a by-election, so we all wish him the best of luck with that.

I start with two clear propositions. First, horses are companion animals and I do not want to encourage the eating of them. Secondly, the transport of horses for human consumption often results in great cruelty and suffering. As I understand it, virtually no horses are exported from the UK to European countries where horsemeat is eaten. I believe that continuing that should be the aim of all those who care about this branch of animal welfare. Those are simple propositions that we would all sign up to.

As I understand it, the Government are proposing two things. The first is to introduce the compulsory passport legislation that my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) and I did as much as we could to oppose. I thought it profoundly misguided to have compulsory passports containing a record of every drug taken by the horse just to facilitate the eating of horses. The second thing that the Government are doing is proposing to end the effective moratorium on the export of live horses from the UK. They say that they hope to get such tough welfare standards approved across Europe that that moratorium will effectively remain in place. I will come on to whether that is true in a minute.

I want to raise another point, however. The Minister wrote a letter to The Daily Telegraph on 8 February, in which he said:

> "There is absolutely no connection between horse exports and equine passports."

I am not at all sure that that is true. If every horse in Britain has a passport and that passport shows what drugs have been administered, it surely makes it more likely that those horses can end up in the food chain. If, at the same time, the Government say that the current status of the law about live exports has to change—everyone agrees that the current status of the law means that horses exported from the UK are always on the hook rather than on the hoof—changing the law could change the situation. Our fear is that for some horses it will mean, "Have passport, will travel." That is what we are trying to avoid.

What does the Minister propose to do? It seems to me that the European Commission is in the process of introducing new regulations for the live transport of horses and other animals. They will be by no means ideal but they will probably be an improvement. I accept that. They will make a bad situation in the EU rather better. However, the question for us in this Chamber is what the effect will be on the UK. That is the key question for the Minister when he winds up the debate.

Why will the Government not go down the route suggested by the International League for the Protection of Horses, which is to ask for an opt-out for the UK from the EU rules so as to prevent effectively the live export of horses from the UK? I cannot do better than to quote from the very good briefing that the ILPH has given to Ministers:

> "The new European rules will not be good enough when you consider that there is no export trade at all from the UK now. In short, the rules will make a bad situation on the Continent a bit better. They must not be an excuse to make a good situation in Britain into a bad one."

That is the nub of it.

I want to make one last point. There is another relationship in the Government's proposals relating to horse passports and the live export of horses. It is quite clear from the Adjournment debate that I held, from the statutory instrument Committee on which my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire and I served and from all the questions that we asked that it was unnecessary to bring in compulsory passports for the UK. The Minister could have fought for a different situation for the UK, where only horses going into the food chain would need a passport, yet the Government gave in. They initially said that we could do that and then they said that it was not possible; they then gave in.

The situation with live exports is similar. We do not want to export live horses for meat. We do not think that it should happen. We think that it is an evil trade—I expect that the Minister would agree. I challenge him, or anyone else, to go out on to the street and find five people who want to see the export of live horses from this country to the continent. They will not find them.

The Minister can go to the Council of Ministers, he can do what is easy and convenient and he can negotiate something that will make life a little better in Europe and a lot worse in Britain or he can stand up and defend his country and negotiate something that allows us to maintain our moratorium on the live export of horses.

[Mr. David Cameron]

The Minister heard from my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire that the relevant commissioner in the European Parliament has now said that an opt-out for Britain is acceptable, and the Minister has no excuse not to make sure that we can get that opt-out. He likes to style himself as the Minister for the horse. If he is, he will fight for that opt-out and will deliver something that is as good as the status quo for this country. Otherwise, he will not be the Minister for the horse, but the Minister for something else—I fear that he will be the Minister for eating horses.

The Minister failed the test on hunting. He promised things to the countryside that he simply did not deliver, such as listening. He then suddenly said that an all-out ban was a jolly good thing, even though that was not what he initially proposed. He failed the test on passports and he let the country down over that. He now faces a third test, on keeping the situation so that horses cannot be exported live from this country for the meat trade. He has got to pass that test, so I look forward to hearing what he has to say.

2.54 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) on bringing a topic of enormous interest to the House's attention. I should declare an interest: my family has always owned horses, and I have several now. It might interest my hon. Friend to know that I have an ancient, retired Shetland pony who is vicious at both ends and tends to come into the house for cake, but I think that we should discuss that later.

I would like to help the Minister. The Government are engaged in a big conversation, talking to the country and to interested groups, and we all know that an election is not terribly far away. I introduced an Adjournment debate on ragwort about three years ago in which I established that an enormous number of people are involved in the horse world: three million people ride, and 500,000 households own more than 1 million horses between them. I calculated that the horse industry is probably the second-largest industry in the countryside.

I totally endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron). I have not met a single person who would support the proposal to end the moratorium. There are a lot of horses in my constituency, and when I go home at weekends I go racing, but I have met no one who supports the proposal. It is extraordinary how obtuse and pig-headed the Government have been.

I shall not go through the reasons for keeping the moratorium, because my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle went through them in depth. I entirely endorse his comments, and I am sure that that will be reflected in the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), who has fought an absolutely splendid campaign. There are good reasons not to remove the moratorium or, indeed, to relax it in any way. Only 7,000 horses are eaten in this country, and we have a totally satisfactory mechanism, involving knacker's yards and hunt kennels, for disposing of redundant and dead horses.

One huge advantage of the Minister taking the opportunity offered by the European Union to take up the derogation would be that we would not have to burden the countryside with the ghastly nightmare—the bureaucratic cost and nonsense—of horse passports. Incredibly, the cattle passports scheme has lost 100,000 cattle. As I said, the National Audit Office reckons that that costs us—the taxpayers—£15 million a year. We have not even started the scheme for horses, which are owned by a far more heterogeneous group of people—and as my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger), who has left the Chamber, said, some horses, including some on Bodmin and other moors, are not owned by a particular person.

If the moratorium were maintained, introducing horse passports would be total nonsense. As the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs website says, the only real reason to have passports is that they > "will satisfy the European commission that the UK has a viable method of identifying horses that have been treated with medicines that must not be administered to food producing animals."

If we are not going to export horses for food, the only horses that will require passports will be racehorses, which already have them, and the 7,000 horses that go into the food chain in this country.

Getting rid of the passport scheme would save an absolute nightmare of costs to the countryside. We are talking about a passport possibly costing up to £50, fines of £5,000 for not having one, and the possibility of a month's imprisonment for a second offence. A lot of riding schools are right on the edge of viability, and the passport scheme will push them over the edge, which would be tragic because horses provide splendid recreation; they are a marvellous way for young people to learn about animals and to get into the horse industry, which is, as I said, enormous.

If the Minister screws his courage to the sticking-place and uses the opportunity that the European Union gave him yesterday to maintain the moratorium, he will agree that there is absolutely no necessity to persist with the bureaucratic nonsense of horse passports.

2.59 pm

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) not only on securing the debate and making a strong case but on timing the debate so fortuitously. A Committee of the European Parliament recently considered an amendment to the regulation that we are debating, and the Council of Ministers is due to debate the issue only two weeks after we return from the Easter recess. In view of the large number of questions that we have for the Minister—to be fair, he has engaged in debate—I shall do my best to keep my comments brief and give him the maximum available time between now and 3.45, when the debate will, sadly, have to end.

I, too, come to the debate happy to declare that in my youth I was the proud owner of a pony. I fully understand the strong passions that the issue arouses. I congratulate the Western Morning News, a newspaper in my region, on mounting a first-class campaign to draw its readership's attention to the potential plight of ponies and horses from the UK. The paper raised a 66,000-signature petition, which made the Government well aware of the issue and which formed part of an 85,000-signature petition that was presented to the European Parliament only yesterday.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): In endorsing the hon. Gentleman's views about the role of the press, I praise The Southern Daily Echo on its efforts. I draw his attention to a headline in today's edition, which states categorically "Ponies off the menu", which suggests that the whole episode as over and done with as a result of the European decision. A Liberal Democrat MEP is even quoted as saying that there is now no question of New Forest ponies being exported for slaughter. Given the hon. Gentleman's more cautious remarks, am I right in thinking that that is not quite yet the position?

Andrew George: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. It would be quite inappropriate of me to admonish a fellow member of my party for perhaps being a little hasty in his conclusions. However, it is obviously encouraging that a Committee of the European Parliament has accepted the amendment in its present form. No doubt my Liberal Democrat colleague hoped that the robustness and strength of the case made in that Committee would make the Minister highly likely to take on board the logic of our argument. Perhaps my colleague assumed, on the basis of such robustness and logic, that the two things followed as night follows day. We shall see if that happens.

I congratulate the International League for the Protection of Horses, which has been steadfast in the campaign. The league has provided an excellent briefing for today's debate and has always been forthcoming with information and advice in response to my questions. The league was responsible for part of the 85,000-signature petition delivered to the European Parliament yesterday.

I asked in an intervention whether the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle had made an assessment of the likely impact of the proposed amendment compared with the Government's alternative. That alternative focuses on the trained-to-halter condition, which would constrain the export to other European countries of live horses for human consumption. That is the nub of the argument, and I hope that the Minister will give a clear indication about the assessments and reassure us that his assessment is that the proposed trained-to-halter constraint on the export of live horses would provide at least the same level of constraint as the current derogation allows. Has the Minister had the opportunity to review the situation since yesterday's debate in a Committee of the European Parliament? Has he come to a conclusion about the position that the Government will take on 30 April, when I understand the Council of Ministers is due to meet to consider this crucial issue? I hope that the Council will come to a conclusion with which the general public in this country, especially horse and pony owners, will be content.

I intervened on the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle to raise the question of journey limits. Irrespective of the question of the fate of ponies and horses from the UK, journey limits affect ponies and horses from other European nations, including eastern European nations, some of which are accession countries. The hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) rightly pointed out in an intervention that the present draft indicates that the current constraint on journey times is likely to be lifted. As for welfare, under the proposed new regulation the rest, feeding and watering of animals is likely to happen only after 24 hours, or even some time after that—and it will take place on the vehicle. Those who love ponies and horses and have regard for them, whether they are from the UK or Europe, or have been brought into Europe from outside, believe that horses should be treated with consideration. I hope that when the Minister debates the issue in the Council of Ministers on 30 April he will consider it carefully. It is important that the UK stands up in Europe and makes a strong case for robust constraints on journey limits. The majority of people in this country who care about horses and ponies will also be extremely worried and concerned about their treatment in other European nations or those potential accession countries such as Romania, which export horses and ponies into the EU—particularly Italy.

I hope that the Minister will have the time to answer questions on whether he will take up the proposed derogation and the amendment to the regulation proposed yesterday in Committee. I wonder what assessment he has made of that, and what efforts he will make to ensure that much more rigorous and robust controls are introduced to constrain journey limits.

Gregory Barker: I concur with much of what the hon. Gentleman has said. Will he be sure to reiterate the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), and thus not encourage his colleagues to think that the war is won? There is much more to do. It would be wrong to send a message out now that we can relax and everything will be all right. We must keep up the pressure.

Andrew George: The hon. Gentleman is right. We could have adjourned this debate had the war been won. The fact that we are here and feel passionate about the issue helps to make the point. It is important that we do not give a false impression that the battle is won—of course it is not. We have achieved something important, which members of all parties should celebrate, but the battle is certainly not won and that is why constructive engagement with the Minister and the Department is important. I hope that, rather than bludgeon the Minister into submission, we shall persuade him to accept a logical, robust and sensible measure.

3.8 pm

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): It is a pleasure, as always, to follow the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George). It is nice to know that the Liberal Democrats are with us on this. I join him in congratulating the Western Morning News in particular, and my local paper, the Western Daily Press, both of which have campaigned long and hard on the issue. There is strong feeling about it throughout the west country. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has taken part in the debate, and I was glad to hear his words of support.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friends who have made useful contributions to the debate; in particular my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory

[Mr. James Gray]

Barker), whose timing was, as always, immaculate, and who introduced the debate eloquently and elegantly. It is also nice to have the expertise of my hon. Friends the Members for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), for Castle Point (Bob Spink) and for Witney (Mr. Cameron), each of whom contributed to developing today's arguments.

I was pleased to exercise the age-old right of a Member of Parliament and come to Parliament today on a horse. I believe that that has not happened since 1920 and the last person to do it was a Conservative MP called Sir Arthur Samuel. I was delighted to be escorted by two outriders from the International League for the Protection of Horses, and I join the hon. Member for St. Ives in paying tribute to that organisation, which has done a fantastic job on campaigning on the issue and changing minds in all parts of the House, in the European Parliament, the Commission and elsewhere. This debate is a tribute to its determination to ensure that the issue is properly aired.

It was a great treat to ride a 23-year-old ex-police horse called ILPH Pascal—three times a winner of the police horse of the year award in the early 1990s. That is exactly the kind of animal that, if we cannot change the Government's mind, will be piled on to lorries, carted off to the continent and turned into sausages. It was an important piece of symbolism that we arrived on horses to show what animals we are seeking to protect.

As several hon. Members have commented, the debate is timely because the European Parliament yesterday agreed to two amendments to which I shall refer shortly. The purpose of the debate is to persuade the Government that their proposals are insufficient and that the vast bulk of the British population are opposed to the proposals, and, in a positive way, to suggest a solution to the difficult problem—a way out of this nasty hole. I hope that, contrary to what the Minister said on the farming programme on which he appeared this morning, he is ready to listen constructively and act on some of our suggestions.

As we have heard, here in Great Britain, we do not eat horses; we never have. Their export to abattoirs on the continent has been banned for some 70 years thanks to the so-called minimum value regulations introduced in 1937 by a Conservative MP, Sir George Cockerill. Those regulations have been extremely effective; they were introduced to prevent the export of live horses, and no horses have been exported from the UK to be eaten. Whatever one might say about the regulations, they work. At this moment, no horses are being exported to the European Union or elsewhere to be eaten.

I accept the Minister's point that it may be time to reconsider those regulations, and that the introduction of the EU transport regulations may make that need more urgent. The purpose of the debate is to try to find an alternative solution to the proposed export of live horses and to replace and replicate the protection of horses afforded by the minimum value regulations.

It is worrying that the Minister seemed to suggest that he could see no moral justification for a ban. He seemed to be saying that, as far as he was concerned, it would be morally legitimate for us to export horses to the continent. No doubt he will say that that will not happen and that he will put in place measures to ensure that it does not. However, his comments suggested to me that he sees no moral justification for banning the export of live horses to be turned into sausages. When he said that, he was alone among the 55 million people in Britain. I suspect that the people of Britain, to a man, woman and child, believe that there is an overwhelmingly strong moral objection to the export of live horses to be turned into sausages—the people of Britain do not want it. If the Minister believes that it is morally acceptable for horses to be exported to Italy to be made into salami, he is on his own.

The Minister gave my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle a moment to intervene. If he now wants to tell us that we, on this side of the House, have the moral case and that he disagrees with us, he should do so.

Alun Michael: I have a question for the hon. Gentleman that neither he nor his hon. Friend have answered. Will he set aside his misinterpretation of what I might say and I have not said, and explain on what moral argument he would base a simple ban?

Mr. Gray: That is precisely the point, and I notice that the Minister did not correct us or say that he believes the export of live horses to be immoral. I believe it to be immoral, wicked and scandalous, and something that we must ban. The Minister has not said that he considers it to be wicked, so I shall tell him why I believe that this is a moral issue. There is a simple moral difference that is reflected in European laws: on the continent of Europe, the horse is an agricultural, food-producing animal. All the regulations on horses on the continent consider them to be a food-producing animal. In this country, we have never done that: the horse is specifically not an agricultural animal, although some would like it to be. If it were an agricultural animal, there would be no business rates. It is often said that there would be all kinds of advantages in it being considered an agricultural animal, but we have always resisted that.

Here, as my hon. Friends eloquently said, the horse is considered to be a companion animal—a sporting animal—not a food-producing animal, and with the exception of 6,000 or 7,000 broken-down racehorses among the 1 million to 1.5 million horses in Britain, we do not kill them to be eaten. That is the moral difference. We in Britain love our horses: we do not see them as food-producing animals, and we do not want them to be slaughtered and made into sausages. That is an overwhelmingly powerful moral argument that the people in Britain will almost unanimously accept, and we shall see that in the papers tomorrow.

Gregory Barker: My hon. Friend has put it brilliantly, but would he not agree that the fact that the so-called Minister for the horse has to ask the question in the first place, because he is not clear what the moral argument is, is really quite scandalous? It is a matter of huge concern to anybody who loves horses that he throws the question open for debate.

Mr. Gray: I would not be so harsh on the unfortunate person who finds himself being the Minister for the horse, because he is in an awkward position. He has been advised up to now that he must do this because of European law, so he regrettably seeks to make out that that there is no moral objection to what he has been forced to do. We should be gentle with the Minister, not force him into a corner or call him immoral. However, we intend in this debate to offer him an alternative—an escape from his awkward position.

Let me give one analogy. Let us suppose that some madman concluded that we should herd together the many millions of stray dogs and cats on Britain's streets, put them on a ship and take them to Korea. I believe that dogs and cats are eaten in Korea, although I find that nauseating. If that were to happen, would not the Minister consider the herding together and shipment of dogs and cats—live and in horrific conditions—to Korea to be eaten, to be immoral? I most certainly would, just as I consider the export of live horses to be entirely abhorrent and obnoxious.

The Minister will tell us that the minimum value regulations will not stand up in court, and he may be right. It is reasonable that we should seek to assist him in trying to find an alternative to them. He is probably right, too, to say that the live transportation regulations, which are currently under consideration on the continent, may make that even more difficult. Incidentally, the Conservatives welcome much of what is proposed in the new EU transportation regulations. As my hon. Friend the Member for Witney said, we hope that they will make a bad situation slightly better, although we have real reservations about the end product of the regulations, because they will still mean that horses and other animals could be on lorries for many days, albeit with rest periods for food, water and veterinary care. However, we see no reason at all why those slightly better transportation regulations on the continent of Europe should necessarily interfere with the ban on the export of live horses from this country.

Having listened to the Minister on various recent occasions, it would appear to me that his intended solution to the problem is to ensure that the export of live horses is not restarted, and I accept that he has said several times that he does not want it to start again. He seems to be indicating that he intends to prevent that by gold plating the welfare regulations, making them so stringent that the trade will become uneconomic. To be fair to him, he has achieved that in one category of horse: unbroken ponies. The regulations on unbroken ponies will almost certainly make that trade nearly impossible.

What about the other types of horse which are not covered, however? If the Minister has in mind extremely high standards that would, in effect, ban any resumption of the live export of all categories of horse and pony, he must at the very least spell out today precisely what those high standards are. It is no good saying, "I'm going to put in place high standards, which I hope is gold plating. I therefore hope that there will not be a market, because it will be too expensive for live export to start." We want to know precisely and in minute detail what those standards are and why they will be achieved. The horse that I rode to Westminster today is probably worth £500 or £600 in the dead meat market. What standards will the Minister put in place to ensure that traders do not want to sell their horse overseas for that amount?

The Minister may also argue that he does not believe that there is a market for live export, or that he hopes that there is not, and that in any case there will not be one under these new, stringent conditions. I am not convinced, particularly in the aftermath of the absurd EU regulations that prevent the burial of carcases on farms. Unscrupulous owners and traders are likely to find an alternative market for end-of-life horses on the continent. As my hon. Friends the Members for Bexhill and Battle and for Witney have said, the Minister's absurd, bureaucratic and unenforceable horse passport regulations will make that export much easier. Live export overseas would not be possible were it not for passports. I call on him to abolish the horse passport scheme, which would solve his problem at a stroke.

The Opposition are by no means convinced that the Minister's promised gold plating will replicate the effective ban that the minimum value regulations provided, and we demand an effective total ban. As one or two of my hon. Friends have commented this afternoon, we now have something that gives the Minister exactly the solution that he seeks. As we have heard, yesterday two of my Conservative colleagues in the European Parliament, Roger Helmer and Neil Parish, to whom I pay tribute, secured broad acceptance of two amendments to the draft regulations. New article 1.2(a), inter alia, reads:

"This regulation shall not be an obstacle to any stricter national measures, including a total ban on the export of live equidae intended for production or slaughter".

New annexe 1, chapter V, paragraph 1.1 reads:

"Journeys by road and rail for slaughter of animals such as domestic equidae"

shall

"not exceed 9 hours . . . Member States can apply shorter transport periods . . . within their own territory or ban exports of certain species for moral reasons."

Incidentally, it was the European Parliament, not the Committee, that passed those amendments in plenary session yesterday. They will go to the Council of Ministers and then to the Commission, which may or may not ratify them. The difficulty is—and here we come to what the Minister must do—that we do not know whether the British Government are asking for those amendments to be passed. We heard that Commissioner Byrne, who has responsibility for these matters, believes them to be perfectly sensible. Last night, he said:

"The Commission supports . . . stricter national rules . . . I am pleased that this would effectively maintain the UK's restriction on the export of horses destined for human consumption".

The European Parliament has unanimously agreed to the amendments, as have the various Committees. The commissioner says that he understands them, that he is ready to go along with them, and that he believes that the Commission will go along with them. The whole European structure says that we can ban the export of live horses. Only one person says that he hopes that more stringent regulations will somehow ban the trade that all of us, except him, believe to be obnoxious and immoral.

Mr. Cameron: The Minister for the horse.

Mr. Gray: As my hon. Friend says, that comes from the Minister.

[Mr. Gray]

The regulations have been amended to allow the ban to continue. The European Parliament wants that, and the commissioner is perfectly happy about it. We need to persuade the Government of the political urgency of continuing the ban. The Minister cannot shelter behind what he calls the unsustainability of the minimum value regulations. He cannot merely blame the EU, because we now know that it agrees with us; nor can he rely on what he claims are much improved standards of welfare in transit.

The Opposition say that no standards of welfare in transit, no matter how gold plated they may be, are sufficiently humane. We believe that we speak for 99 per cent. of the people of Britain. We demand an absolute ban on the export of live horses for slaughter for human consumption. The Minister should deserve his name as Minister for the horse; he must not become the Minister for the slaughtering of horses.

3.25 pm

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I shall seek to cover the wide range of issues raised this afternoon. First, however, I congratulate the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) on securing the debate. He has highlighted an important issue, but he and others are wrong to worry people without justification. Serious issues are involved, but to worry people by suggesting that the Government are going to relax, or somehow allow a diminution in, the protection of horses or their welfare is wrong.

The hon. Gentleman rightly says that we need to improve the regulations and that they need to be based on horse welfare. That is precisely what we have done, but that was not the drift of all the hon. Gentleman's speech although it is an important point.

The hon. Gentleman and one or two others strayed on to the question of horse passports. The Government have not introduced a top-down bureaucratic system; we have worked with the horse industry to strengthen the role of our country's horse organisations and to produce a sensible system. He and others should talk more to the horse organisations with which we worked. They would then realise that they have missed a great deal of the point.

Mr. Gray: The Minister may have consulted the horse industry, but has he consulted the Pony Club, the breed organisations or the Association of British Riding Schools, of which, I should warn him, I am president?

Alun Michael: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's affection for one or two horse organisations, but we consulted with a wide range of organisations, including the breed societies, the International League for the Protection of Horses and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Indeed, the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle is right to highlight that issue, which is one that people feel strongly about. We have received several thousand letters, postcards and petitions from hon. Members, campaign groups and the public on the subject, which demonstrates the strength of feeling, but some of those communications were not about anything that we have ever contemplated doing.

Gregory Barker: Does the Minister not agree that, contrary to his opening remark that we have raised the subject to worry people, we are articulating the genuine concerns of thousands of people? This is not an issue that has been whipped up in Parliament; the Opposition are articulating a real concern.

Alun Michael: I have to say that some Conservative Members sought to exploit the strong feeling held by many. Indeed, I welcome the idea of positive engagement, which was put forward by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George). He, at least, wants proper protection for horses to result from today's debate and from how those issues are addressed in the long term. I invite Conservative Members to engage in such a constructive debate, even though doing so may seem strange to them.

Mr. Cameron: Will the Minister give way?

Alun Michael: In a moment.

Most of those who have written to us expressing such strong views support, without seeming to know it, what the Government are trying to achieve—namely, the prevention of the live export of horses for slaughter. I welcome their support. The Government are working to protect and improve the welfare of horses.

Let us look at the facts. There is no ban on the export of horses for slaughter, and there never has been. The national rules on horse and pony exports, which are sometimes referred to as the minimum values rules, merely place restrictions on the export of certain working horses—that is, horses intended for work abroad, not those sent for slaughter—and some ponies. Those long-standing provisions prevented the export of unfit or worthless older working horses and ponies—that is why they were introduced—but so-called working horses such as shire horses are now more likely to be exported for showing or competition. In other words, the minimum values do not apply. That is why I asked Conservative Members several times whether they had read the rules or understood them.

Some people believe that those restrictions have served to limit horse and pony exports. The fact is that there is hardly any such trade, and because we do not want to see it grow or to send the wrong signal, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and I do not intend to relax or remove the minimum values until and unless we have new arrangements that protect horses and their welfare. I have made that absolutely clear in a letter, which I have sent to hon. Members, including Opposition Members here today. I am surprised that they sought to cast doubt on that during the debate.

The minimum values are relatively small. They have not been updated for 25 years, so it is a pretty poor nag that would be protected by the law as it stands, even if it happened to be a working horse that came within the very limited categories to which the rules apply. The current arrangements also provide a bureaucratic obstacle to the legitimate and worthwhile movement of horses and ponies for sport and recreation. Increasingly, people go abroad and have to follow the regulations, which is an obstacle for those who have nothing to do with the export of horses for slaughter.

The problem is that the alternatives that Opposition Members are providing do not necessarily do what they think they will do. I have said on several occasions that laws do not always prevent what they forbid. We want legislation that works. We want regulations that prevent the trade and address the issues of horse welfare and animal welfare.

Several hon. Members rose—

Alun Michael: I give way to the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), as promised.

Mr. Cameron: When raising this concern with every Member of Parliament, the ILPH said that it is extremely concerned that there is a real risk that this vital legislation will be repealed. Does the Minister think that the ILPH is whipping up trouble?

Alun Michael: I would put it this way: it is interesting that in private the ILPH has congratulated me on what I am doing to protect the welfare of horses. It did that at a large meeting last week. It is interesting that the ILPH and the RSPCA came to talk to me about the need to keep up the slaughter of horses in this country so that meat can be exported to avoid the animal welfare problems that arise from horses travelling abroad for slaughter. I can see their point entirely. It is a good, straight point and hon. Members need to understand it.

It is important to separate the issue of the slaughter of horses—where they go, how we get the value that pays for that slaughter, the horse slaughterhouses and how humane slaughter is dealt with in this country at the end of an animal's life—from the issue of export and the welfare of horses in transit. Those issues are both important, but they need to be understood if Members and the general public—a well-informed general public, I would like to think—are to understand what is necessary to protect horses from the trade that several Members have rightly said that they want to prevent and which we are working hard to prevent.

Several hon. Members rose—

Alun Michael: I give way to the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray).

Mr. Gray: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, although I shall draw a blind over the fact that he seemed to be praying in aid the RSPCA and the ILPH, which is quite incorrect. They are both entirely opposed to what he proposes.

The Minister says that the minimum value legislation is ineffectual but, none the less, he is certain to keep it in place until we have something better. Will he answer two questions? If the legislation is so ineffectual, why does it work? Not one horse is being exported at the moment, so it seems to me that it is working pretty well. Secondly, if he is to put something better in its place that has exactly the same effect—I welcome the fact that he says that he does not like live export—will he explain in detail what it will be?

Alun Michael: First, the legislation is ineffectual: if the hon. Gentleman simply reads the law he will see that it does not ban what he and his colleagues suggest it bans.

Mr. Gray: It works.

Alun Michael: It does not. Look at the law and what it does. It does not ban what Opposition Members say it does. There has been a general understanding that the minimum values protect a limited range of animals, and to get rid of those regulations would send the wrong signal. That is all I am saying. The idea of a trade in horses for slaughter from this country is abhorrent to people in this country. The organisations that I said have agreed with me have said that controlling the export of horses for slaughter is the issue.

The hon. Member for North Wiltshire cited the RSPCA. That organisation has just written to hon. Members to express its worry about elements of the presidency's proposals for dealing with the issue of animals in transit. I spoke to the RSPCA yesterday to clarify whether the point involves general animal welfare issues and whether it is happy with the situation that we have achieved for horses. It confirmed that it supports the situation that we have achieved for horses. Its concerns relate to the wider issue of the welfare of animals in transit, and it is worried that the presidency's proposals are not strong enough.

Andrew George: The Minister says that he wants regulations that work, but I do not think that we in this Chamber are better than anyone else at second-guessing the likely outcome of the various proposals. He says that his proposals would be as good, if not better, than the current arrangements. Is he prepared to stake his career and reputation on that, is he confident of the outcome and will he support the amendments proposed by the European Parliament? Surely that would directly achieve the outcome that all of us, including him, want.

Alun Michael: There is a lot in what the hon. Gentleman says. First, our categoric intention—I have written to all Members of the House about this—is not to relax the minimum value regulations unless and until something a great deal better is available. We want to achieve what people believe the regulations achieve. One reason for wanting to be sure that that is practical is that instead of just discussing it with DEFRA officials, my officials and I have been discussing it with the horse welfare organisations and organisations such as the RSPCA, and looking at what would work in practice.

A lot of hard work has been done and I commend the willingness of horse welfare organisations to engage with us to try to achieve something that works. A great deal of serious work is going on and the way in which some Opposition Members talk that down shows outrageous opportunism. The emotive language of the hon. Member for North Wiltshire on turning our horses into sausages is the opposite of engagement.

What the European Parliament decided yesterday is interesting and may be helpful. We shall examine that in detail. As I understand the amendment, it would allow a provisional ban on horses for slaughter, but subject to an assessment of the legal issues concerning the treaty. We need to know how it would work in practice and what is the relationship between the resolution, to which the commissioner gave a general tick, and other parts of European legislation.

I certainly give a commitment to examine that carefully to see whether it provides something that we can use, and I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs will consider the matter equally seriously. We are not sure that it will do so and I do not want to build up hopes, because it is not the easy stroke that a resolution sometimes seems to be, but we will consider it and what the Commission has to say about it to see where we can get to.

Clearly there are concerns among animal welfare organisations generally about the presidency proposals. We are taking a lead in Europe by working for effective regulation to protect the welfare of horses, not just in the United Kingdom, but throughout Europe, including the accession states.

I shall explain the current EU legislation. A lot has been made of the opt-out clause in the 1991 directive on welfare during transport. That clause was an attempt to acknowledge that the directive did not set welfare rules for horse journeys, so member states were able to make up their own rules. From that clause stemmed our legal basis for retaining the minimum value rules, although they do not do what many people think they do. In 1995, rules for horse and pony journeys were agreed at EU level and implemented in the UK in 1997—not immediately after they were agreed and not by the party of the hon. Member for North Wiltshire, but by the incoming Administration. There was a dragging of feet over the implementation of those rules and some hon. Members will remember the controversy over that.

In contrast, this Government are committed to and put high priority on high standards of animal welfare, but improvement in welfare rules, including enforcement, will really count if they are made at European level so that horses and ponies receive better protection during transport on the continent and not just in the UK. Last year, the European Commission brought forward its long-awaited proposals to amend the transport rules. This is where the issue of the impact of its proposals comes in. We are pleased that both the Italian and Irish presidencies have taken things forward.

During the negotiations, Britain has been seeking high standards for horses, along with better enforcement. Campaigning organisations say that long journeys for horses and ponies take place on the continent. I agree. That is something that we want to prevent. It is the prospect of British horses and ponies being subjected to such journeys that leads campaigners to press for a ban on live exports, and I entirely sympathise with those concerns, but let us be honest: the minimum value rules are out of date and, even more importantly, do not achieve the improved welfare standards for horses. It is not an option to continue to operate those rules unchanged. We want similar or better controls.

We considered an outright ban, but the problem is enforcement. That is why we have to look carefully at the suggestions made yesterday to see whether they would achieve what we want. There is no prohibition on horses being exported for other reasons—breeding, riding or exhibition. Once exported, we have no control over what happens to those animals. If we were simply to ban exporting horses for slaughter, the regulation would be enforceable only in the case of horses presented as destined directly for slaughter.

The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) is right to say that the issue is what is good for business—that is, the slaughter taking place in this country—and good for horse welfare as well.

Bob Spink rose—

Gregory Barker rose—

Alun Michael: I must give way to the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle.

Gregory Barker: The Minister is intent on seeing everything to do with horse welfare through the prism of the transport regulations. Would he be happy if, with the introduction of horse passports, there was a large increase in the number of British horses slaughtered to feed the Italian market for horsemeat, but the slaughtering took place in the UK and the horses were simply shipped as carcases? Is he prepared to preside over a regime that produces a major increase in slaughtering horses to feed the salami market?

Alun Michael: Does the hon. Gentleman want to stop the slaughter of horses in this country for export as meat? In that case he would be contradicting the ILPH and the RSPCA. They came to me recently to ask for a variation in relation to horse passports simply because they want the number of horses that are slaughtered in this country and which enter the food chain abroad to be maintained—they believe that that is in the interests of horse welfare. He must come clean about where he stands.

Bob Spink: My point is not that we should slaughter animals in this country to export them for food, but that we should seek to stop the live export of all animals from this country.

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point; if animals are slaughtered for export the meat goes abroad. He is right about the animal welfare imperative of approaching the matter in that way. I agree with him—I am delighted to say that I am prepared to make an exception on occasion.

Horses hold a special place in the heart of the British public, but we need to understand the relationship between the different elements. Those who are involved in the welfare of horses understand the issues and understand that the welfare of animals in this country—I am talking about humane slaughter at the end of a productive life—depends on the value of horsemeat after slaughter. That is an animal welfare consideration. It is also a consideration in relation to other animals.

In this country, we view horses and ponies as sporting animals, pets and companions rather than as food, but we need to be honest about the position of horses and ponies that are unwanted or have completed their useful life. Horses are slaughtered in this country for meat for human consumption abroad. Horse welfare organisations tell me that they want that to continue because it is good for the welfare of horses and it means that there is humane slaughter. Last year, more than 6,700 horses were slaughtered for meat for human consumption. They were slaughtered in this country for their meat to be exported—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Drug Rehabilitation Services (Somerset)

3.45 pm

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I am very pleased to have secured this short debate about drug rehabilitation services in Somerset, and I am delighted to welcome the Minister. He may be aware that I have already met his colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), and we discussed the issue on 27 January. Therefore, some dialogue has already been opened up, but I appreciate that drug services is an issue on which there is partnership between the Home Office and the Department of Health. I am therefore very pleased that a Health Minister is present.

The Minister knows that I was keen to secure the debate because there is something of a crisis in access to drug rehabilitation services, particularly in South Somerset. I am very pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) is present because we both represent that area.

The Minister may know from the briefing that he has received from the National Treatment Agency for Substance Misuse that the waiting time to access drug rehabilitation services in South Somerset is way over the levels set by the agency, way over the targets set by the Government and way in excess of the waiting time that we want for the very vulnerable people we are talking about.

Perhaps I can highlight for the Minister two issues about access to services locally that give me most concern. The first statistic is the national target for the maximum acceptable waiting length for specialist prescribing. The Minister knows that, through the NTA, the Government have set a maximum waiting time of three weeks. That seems to be a sensible figure and it demonstrates that they want to give priority to people with serious drug misuse problems and get them into the system as quickly as possible. In Somerset, against the access target of three weeks, the average waiting time is 14.3 weeks. In South Somerset, the current average wait is 36 weeks, with the longest being 40 weeks. Those figures are very unsatisfactory and way above the time limit that the Government have set.

I received a letter from a consultant psychiatrist in substance misuse who works for the Somerset drugs service and assists many of the individuals who require access to the service. On 9 January, he wrote to me to say:

> "Whilst access to prescribing is currently determined by an assessment of risk I have been told to prescribe only to those within the Trust's red band on the risk matrix. This is defined by people who are at possible risk of unexpected death or likely or certain of permanent injury or serious assault on others. Excluded are those who are at possible risk of semi permanent injury, violence, aggression or self harm. The threshold ... is at considerably above what I would consider to be the clinical requirements for immediate prescribing."

There is therefore a very serious problem in Somerset, and especially in South Somerset.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I concur with absolutely everything that my hon. Friend has said. A third issue is recidivism in the criminal justice system. Recently, I spoke to a constituent who was a habitual criminal in order to pay for his drug habit. He had been released from prison and had returned home desperately wanting to get off drugs and find a way of escaping from a life of crime, but he will not receive treatment for the best part of a year. Inevitably, he will slide back into criminal behaviour unless he is helped. Is not that another factor that suggests that we need a much better service?

Mr. Laws: My hon. Friend is right. It is because many individuals with such needs have come to my advice centre in the past three to six months that I have taken up this issue. It is not only the individuals and their families who suffer as a consequence of the lack of timely access to drug rehabilitation services. It is almost certainly the case that the crime levels that we are experiencing in Somerset, in particular, are inflated because many people who have serious drug misuse problems are offending to fund their addiction. What is more, those people tell us that that is precisely what they are doing.

I acknowledge the progress that the Government have made since they came to power in 1997. The prime purpose of this debate is not to apportion blame among the various agencies in Somerset and the Government. I acknowledge that many people across the country are now receiving drug rehabilitation treatment. There has been a significant increase in the number, particularly since 1998.

I also wish to pay tribute to the work of the many agencies in Somerset, not least the drug service, the primary care trust, which seeks to work in partnership with the drug service, and the drug action team. All those agencies are trying to get on top of the problem, but in the past few months there has been too little progress in reducing the scale of it.

As my hon. Friend said, we have seen many individuals in our advice centres in the past three to six months who have come to us because they cannot get access to drug rehabilitation services at precisely the time that they need them. Ministers in the Department are on record as having said during the past few years that they want a service that will allow people, when they are ready, to access in a timely fashion the drug rehabilitation assistance that they need. We do not have such a service at present.

I have seen in my advice centre in the past few months individuals with a serious criminal background who tell me that they continue to offend to fund their illegal drug addiction because they cannot get assistance through the drug service. They have come out of the criminal justice system and are trying to re-establish their lives and their family's stability, but they have gone back on to drugs because they are not able to get support from local services. I have also seen individuals outside the criminal justice system who have been told that their best chance of getting access to drug rehabilitation services is to commit an offence so that they can be put through the criminal justice system and then perhaps be fast-tracked for drug treatment and testing orders.

Most tragically, I have seen individuals such as the parents of a young man who tried to commit suicide a few months ago. He is now in Yeovil district hospital with severe brain damage, having failed to get drug rehabilitation assistance when he needed it. Obviously, the details of that case must be investigated to establish precisely the reasons behind his actions, but it cannot have been a helpful factor that access to drug rehabilitation services is as constrained as it is.

Of course, all those individuals have a responsibility to themselves and to society to tackle their problems of misuse. We must not put all the blame on agencies, the Government and others. However, we have a strong interest as a community in resolving the problem, not only because of the effect on individuals but because of the effect on our community of higher crime levels and the effect on families of members who have drug misuse problems.

The figures that the Somerset drugs service sent to me yesterday and which I cited briefly at the beginning of the debate are horrific, particularly for the South Somerset area. I go back to specialist prescribing, which is where much of the pressure is. The waiting time limit set by the Government is three weeks, but the average waiting time in Somerset is 14.3 weeks, and that in South Somerset is 36 weeks, which is horrific. The Government's target for shared-care prescribing is, again, three weeks, but the average for the county is 6.5 weeks and that for South Somerset is 14.5 weeks. The Government want people to have assessments within a couple of weeks, but it takes roughly double that in Somerset and South Somerset. The local agencies and the Government face a huge challenge in dealing with the problem.

The waiting list for access in Somerset at present stands at 118 people, of which three quarters are waiting in the Yeovil area and in South Somerset. Therefore, there are particular difficulties in those areas. As a result, only priority and perhaps even only top-priority cases are being seen. People are being seen for assessment but not for treatment, unless they fall into the category of suicide risks or are pregnant women. That leaves out a huge range of people with really serious needs, some of whom pose a serious risk to society because of their drug addiction habits and the criminal activity needed to fund them. A huge range of people are altogether outside the system, including serious drug addicts, who are having to wait months on end—up to six, seven or eight months—to access treatment.

The Minister will probably know some of the reasons for the problems that we have in Somerset, which are rather well set out in a letter from the consultant psychiatrist in substance misuse whom I cited earlier. In his letter to GPs in the South Somerset primary care trust area on 9 January, he explained the background to the problems there:

"Last year we undertook a review of SDS prescribing policy. Our revised approach was consistent with Models Of Care (a National Treatment Agency document which in effect is a National Service Framework for drug services). We moved from an abstinence orientated service to one espousing harm reduction as a primary goal. We now aim to maintain people within treatment whilst offering a range of prescribing options within an evidence based framework. This policy was launched and endorsed at a multi-agency seminar in February 2003. At that stage and indeed subsequently SDS managers highlighted the prescribing cost implications. At an operational level the strategy has proved successful in so far as we have increased the numbers of people in treatment by almost 100 per cent."

I am afraid, however, that in the first half of the last financial year the Somerset drug service was so successful in getting people into the service and dealing with their needs that its prescribing budget, which was only £130,000 for the whole county, ran out about halfway through the year. At that stage, the service was still willing to continue assessing people but could not provide any treatment. That is why we now have such horrendous figures for waiting times, which are probably among the worst in the country—at least I hope that they are, because I would not want other areas to be experiencing worse problems.

We must consider what some of the solutions to the problem might be. The local agencies are already doing important work to help deal with the problem on the ground. The prescribing budget is to be increased in the next financial year by about 50 per cent., from £130,000 to £200,000. I believe that that uses some of the money from the Home Office's criminal justice drive to improve drug rehabilitation services for offenders. However, that may be of less use to those without an offending history. There will be more work locally with the primary care trusts to provide shared care and nurses. There will also be a shift in the staffing resources in Somerset, away from some of the areas that have lesser problems and towards South Somerset.

Significant problems are likely to remain, however. First, although the increase in the prescribing budget sounds quite impressive, it will be enough only to stabilise the existing number of people being dealt with. It may well not be enough to clear the backlog. Secondly, shifting resources in Somerset to South Somerset may improve the situation, but at a cost to other areas in the county. There is also a wider budget problem, in that the drugs action team budget for Somerset is to increase only by 0.07 per cent. in the financial year 2004–05. That will make it difficult to put the resources into prescribing, residential rehabilitation and other forms of treatment to improve the situation on the ground.

At my last meeting with the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, she pledged to look into the problem. She wrote back to me on 26 February to clarify that she accepted that we have a serious problem in Somerset and that she had asked the National Treatment Agency for Substance Misuse to look into the situation and to prioritise the waiting times in Somerset. She said that she had asked to be kept informed about progress on the issue. Does the Minister here today accept that there is a serious problem in Somerset and in South Somerset in particular? What can he do to encourage the NTA to take a proactive approach along with the local agencies to resolve the problem?

At present, we are in an unsatisfactory position, which is putting many people and their families at risk. It is also increasing the level of crime across the Somerset area and in South Somerset in particular. It will undoubtedly cost money to resolve some of the problems, but if we continue to allow them to go unresolved, it will be even more expensive to us in terms of broken families, failing services and the increase in crime that will result.

4.1 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I congratulate the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) on securing a debate on this important topic. He and the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) raise valid concerns about service levels in their local communities.

From the remarks of the hon. Member for Yeovil, I know that he shares the Government's belief that effective drug treatment is vital if we are to drive down the misery and damage to society that the misuse of illegal drugs causes. The Government have shown themselves to be prepared to back up that belief with substantial extra funding. In this financial year, the pooled drug treatment budget has risen to £243.6 million, which coupled with substantial increases last year means that, in the past two years alone, local drug action teams have received average increases in funding well in excess of 50 per cent.

The Government's view that treatment works is supported by research. The national treatment outcome research study, the most important UK research into drug treatment, shows the enormous benefits to both society and those individuals who complete treatment. From an economic perspective, the findings have shown that every £1 spent on treatment saves £3 of expenditure in the criminal justice system. That finding alone would have been enough to persuade the Government that increasing the public money spent on drug treatment was justified and that helping individual drug users was cost effective for the population as a whole.

In addition, the national treatment outcome research study showed that the longer we are able to retain an individual who misuses drugs in treatment, the more likely it is that a successful outcome will be achieved. One of the key measures of whether additional funding is being used effectively is the Government public service agreement on treatment, which set a target of doubling the number of users in treatment by 2008. I am pleased that the latest figures, published in December 2003, show that the estimated numbers in treatment during 2002–03 increased by 41 per cent. against the estimated baseline of 100,000 in 1998, which means that we are on track to achieve our target.

The new funding that the Government have made available for drug treatment, to which the hon. Gentleman was kind enough to allude, needs to be spent effectively and that is why the National Treatment Agency for Substance Misuse was established in 2001. The NTA was created to set standards for the provision and commissioning of drug treatment performance and to monitor and tackle variations in treatment standards and availability wherever they occur.

One of the areas that the NTA has prioritised is ensuring that there are sufficient trained staff to work within treatment services. To address that issue, the NTA is implementing a work force strategy to encourage professionals to work in the field of drug treatment. That is already having a substantial impact, with the NTA reaching its 2008 target of 9,000 drug treatment workers by December 2003, an increase of more than 30 per cent.

We also recognise that we offer as much support and guidance as is possible for those groups who are providing treatment to drug misusers. Examples include the clinical guidelines on the management of drug dependence published by the Department of Health in 1999.

We have also developed guidance on the optimum models of care for drug treatment services. That document is known as models of care. It aims to provide the national framework for drug misuse services in England necessary to achieve equity, parity and the commissioning and provision of substance misuse care and treatment. It has the status of a national service framework.

As part of models of care, the NTA has required all areas to publish local care pathways by April 2004. I believe that that will be a major step forward in the delivery of drug treatment services across the country. In addition, the Department of Health has made £3.6 million available to the Royal College of General Practitioners to allow it to develop a course to assist health care professionals to develop the skills needed to work with drug misusers. The funding has meant that more than 1,000 health care professionals have been able to undertake the accredited training course.

Agreement has been reached for drug treatment in primary care trusts to be subject to the Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection star rating system. That means that drug treatment is now one of the national health service's top 10 priorities. As part of the work of setting standards in drug treatment services, the NTA is providing specialist advice to CHAI. The Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson), who has responsibility for drug treatment, has also asked the NTA to explore the potential for developing a joint inspectorate programme with CHAI.

Overarching all the work that the NTA does is the need to reduce the time that anyone who needs drug treatment has to wait before their treatment begins. That is crucial as a delay in offering treatment can lead to the drug user losing their motivation to enter treatment, so that by the time a place is available, they are no longer interested and the opportunity has been missed. That is why, in December 2001, the NTA, working with the NHS Modernisation Agency to ensure that the targets were consistent with work going on elsewhere in the NHS, set maximum waiting-time targets against which drug action teams are being measured. Although there is some way to go, with delays in accessing treatment unacceptably long in some parts of the country, the overall trend is positive, with waiting times reduced from eight to 11 weeks to two to four weeks in most parts of the country. We are convinced that those waiting time reductions have had a substantial impact in reducing the numbers of drug misusers who are referred but who fail to enter treatment.

We now come to the issues that will be of real concern to the hon. Gentleman. One of the effects of a reduction in waiting times is that demand for treatment increases, as fewer users drop out while waiting for treatment. That is an issue that has been identified across the country. As part of their planning, drug action teams are expected to include an expectation of increased demand for treatment as a result of a reduction in waiting times. That seems to be at the root of the problems that have been encountered by the Somerset drugs service. I accept that local agencies should build in plans to cope with increased numbers seeking treatment as a result of the reduction in waiting times. However, I understand that the increased demand in Somerset was far in excess of anything experienced elsewhere in the country. To put that into context, if drug action teams are to ensure that the Government meet their target of doubling the numbers in treatment by 2008, they need to increase the numbers in treatment by approximately 10 per cent. a year. The Somerset drugs service had 287 active clients in July to September 2002, but the number had risen to 426 clients by the same quarter of 2003. That is an increase of almost 50 per cent. in one year, which is five times the national average increase.

Mr. Laws: I understand the Minister's point entirely, but one could derive two conclusions from that big increase in demand. One could be that there are significantly worse drug problems in part of Somerset than in other parts of the country. The other could be that the Somerset drugs service has been too successful in taking into the service many of the drug addicts out there. In either situation, the solution must surely be more funding to enable the service to deal with those individuals rather than push them away.

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Gentleman is right. In many ways, the problem has been generated by success. It highlights the fact that we needed to start introducing these programmes and these substantial increases in expenditure to try to address what was clearly a hidden problem. We cannot simply turn a tap on and solve these problems overnight. That takes time. A particular problem arose in Somerset that is out of kilter with similar effects elsewhere in the country. We must examine the Somerset experience and ask ourselves how that needs to be managed in order to resolve it.

As I said, the fact that there should have been planning in no way removes responsibility from the local agencies to continue to reduce waiting times and to provide the treatment places needed. The hon. Gentleman voiced concerns about a particular local problem that needs a local solution. The NTA regional office, the Somerset drug action team and the Somerset drugs service have been working together to ensure that that happens. Delays in access to treatment are unacceptable. Delays in being able to offer treatment can lead to the drug user losing the motivation to enter treatment.

I know from a meeting that the hon. Gentleman had with the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) and from a subsequent written response that he is aware of the high priority that has been given to tackling these problems. Partners at a local level have been active in putting in place short and medium-term strategies to address some of these problems. For example, the Somerset drug action team opted into the opening doors programme run by NTA and the National Institute of Mental Health for England, which will help to modernise services and to reduce waiting times. It has improved operating procedures in line with the opening doors programme to ensure a more consistent approach to the delivery of drug treatment services.

A data collection system has been established to monitor waiting times more accurately. This has also meant that we have, for the first time, accurate data on geographic areas that were not available before. The team also invested in two peripatetic nurses for the Somerset drugs service in 2002–03 to help to reduce waiting times. They are currently working in the high waiting time areas to increase capacity. In addition, the drug action team commissioned a strategic review of the adult drug treatment system. The final report makes clear recommendations about reconfiguration of service provision, and the team will act on those recommendations in 2004–05.

Mr. Laws: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Ladyman: I have only a couple of minutes left, and I have a few more comments to make.

There has also been additional funding from the drug action team. In 2002–03 and 2003–04, increases in funding were made available to the Somerset drugs service. In 2004–05, £205,600 will also be made available for prescribing, which will provide another 74 places. That represents a growth in capacity of 56 per cent. since last year. Further increases in investment are expected in future years.

The NTA and the strategic health authority will work together to strengthen the commissioning of drug treatment services in Somerset to ensure that this particular local problem is overcome and that commissioning arrangements are as robust as possible. I have been asked to ensure that the hon. Gentleman and Ministers are kept fully informed of developments. I will also ensure that the hon. Member for Somerset and Frome is also appraised of progress and that they are both consulted on planned changes when appropriate.

It is always easy to blame a lack of resources for any problems that occur in the provision of services, but I do not believe that the concerns that the hon. Member for Yeovil expressed today about drug treatment services in Somerset can be explained simply by a lack of funding. The formula used to allocate funds will always mean that those areas with the greatest social and economic need will receive the largest increases, and I am sure that all Members will appreciate why that is so. This has meant that Somerset does not receive as large an increase in its pooled drug treatment budget allocation as some other areas of the country. Nevertheless, investment in drug treatment services in Somerset has increased by 47 per cent. in the past two years. The increase in 2004–05 may be very modest, but it was announced in advance so that it could be planned for, and Somerset will receive an additional 11 per cent. in 2005–06.

I again thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to speak on this important issue. I hope that what I have said today makes it clear that the Government are committed to access to effective drug treatment services throughout the country, and that we are committed to helping to ensure that urgent remedial action is taken where that access is lacking. I hope that he is at least partly reassured that we are aware of the problems in Somerset and that we determined to put them right.

Print Cartridges

4.15 pm

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): I am pleased to be able to raise the issue of the recycling of printer cartridges and the waste electrical and electronic equipment directive, known as the WEEE directive. The purpose of the debate is to urge the Government to incorporate print cartridges in the implementation of the directive by the UK and to consider printer cartridges as electrical equipment rather than consumables.

I raise the matter because of the threat to the recycling industry that remanufactures printer cartridges, and the threat to the environment. The threat arises from the anti-competitive practices of some major manufacturers of printers and print cartridges, which use smart chips and, worse, killer chips, to prevent the reuse of printer cartridges. That could have a serious impact on the recycling industry in the next two years. Unless printer cartridges are included in the implementation of the WEEE directive as electrical equipment, killer chips and devices that thwart recycling will be considered permissible, despite the intentions of the European Union.

I acknowledge the help that I have had in preparing for this debate from the United Kingdom Cartridge Recyclers Association, and especially Mr. Malcolm Kerman of LaserXchange, in my constituency. I am also grateful to Friends of the Earth for its support for the campaign. It has said:

> "The Government must support the reuse of printer cartridges by ensuring that they are covered by the WEEE directive."

I have written to my hon. Friend the Minister about the matter a couple of times and tabled some parliamentary questions. I am grateful for the opportunity that I had to discuss the matter with him at the recent meeting of the all-party group on sustainable waste. Like many other hon. Members, I signed early-day motion 512, which has been supported by hon. Members from both sides of the House.

One of the companies in the industry is based in my constituency. It is called LaserXchange and was formed in 1990. It now employs just under 100 staff. The company specialises in collecting used printer cartridges, mainly from charity shops. Those cartridges are taken to the factory, opened and refilled with toner. The remanufactured cartridges are then sold to consumers as cheaper alternatives to new cartridges.

The practice benefits consumers, who find the cost of recycled print cartridges substantially less than the cost of the new product. Typically, a new black cartridge for the printer in my office in Westminster would cost £23.50, whereas a recycled or reused cartridge from LaserXchange would cost only £9.95 plus VAT. The prices for colour cartridges are £36.72 plus VAT, or £16.95 for a re-used cartridge.

The main products remanufactured at LaserXchange are laser toner cartridges that are used mainly by businesses, but the firm also manufactures inkjet cartridges, which are generally used by individuals with home computers. I have visited the LaserXchange factory twice in recent months—most recently with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, who is also, of course, the Leader of the House. He asked me to consider to what extent recycled cartridges are used in the Palace of Westminster and in the Departments. I shall come to that matter a little later.

Collecting used cartridges from consumers and supplying the remanufacturers is a valuable source of income for charity shops such as Oxfam, Cancer Research UK and the British Heart Foundation. Seventy per cent. of the cartridges collected by LaserXchange come from those three charity shops. The remainder come from scout groups and schools. The charity receives about £2.50 for each cartridge collected. The industry therefore supports the developing world and the voluntary sector in the United Kingdom. Last year, LaserXchange distributed £162,000 to those three charities.

Apart from LaserXchange, there are several other major printer cartridge remanufacturers, including Green Man Toner in Epsom, IT Imager in Hemel Hempstead, PBTI International in Wells, Somerset, Applied Film Industries in Newcastle-under-Lyme and Cartridge World Ltd. based in Harrogate. There are also about 80 other companies in the industry. LaserXchange believes that its industry is under threat from increasingly sophisticated microchips, which are inserted into the cartridges. These are called anti-remanufacture devices, and according to the UK Cartridge Remanufacturers Association, nearly all new laser toner cartridges sold by international companies, such as Hewlett Packard, Lexmark and Xerox, contain such microchips, which can prevent or make uneconomic their remanufacture and use.

Current practices include using highly encrypted microchips to control cartridge functions, which prevent cartridges from being used a second time. These are referred to as killer chips, and use highly sophisticated microchips, operated by radio signals to control cartridge function. They are extremely difficult and costly to copy and make most of the cost of remanufacture prohibitively expensive. Article 4 of the WEEE directive makes the use of such devices illegal. I shall touch on that subject later.

According to one argument, substitute chips are available, so why we should worry? The Minister will know there is a concern that, with ever more encryptions being applied to the chips, the time and cost of producing a substitute mean that it is increasingly likely that they will not be available in future. The Minister's officials suggest that this will be addressed under the energy-using products directive, but can he guarantee that that will be the case? Can the remanufacturing industry wait until 2008 or 2010? From my own discussions, I hear that the industry might well not be in a position to benefit from the EUP directive if the Government do not act quickly. When I raised the matter on the Floor of the House during the Welsh affairs debate just before 1 March, I quoted some examples, including that of Hewlett Packard using killer chips. However, I have met officials of Hewlett Packard and received correspondence from them, and I withdraw that comment. It was inaccurate, and the officials assure me that, although they use smart chips, they do not use killer chips.

Notwithstanding that correction, companies such as Hewlett Packard are clearly in competition and consider the remanufacturers to be a threat, although perhaps not a major one. However, the remanufacturers consider Hewlett Packard's devices, and those of other companies, to be a very serious threat to their industry. Unfortunately, there is no formal definition of a "killer chip", and that will be subject to much debate.

The WEEE directive aims to reduce the amount of electrical and electronic equipment becoming waste, and to achieve that through reuse, recycling and other forms of recovery. It also seeks to improve the environmental performance of all parties involved in the life cycle of electrical and electronic equipment. Member states must comply with the directive by 13 August 2004. Under article 4,

"equipment must not include any designed features that prevent it from being reused, unless there is a safety or environmental reason for doing so."

The Government's position, as I understand it, is that printer cartridges are considered to be consumables, and are outside the WEEE directive's scope. That has been set out in letters to myself and other hon. Members, and in answers to parliamentary questions. However, the Minister will be aware that that view is contested by a number of legal and technical experts, who question, first, whether consumables are automatically excluded, and secondly, whether printer cartridges are not waste electrical and electronic equipment in their own right. He will also know that, if printer cartridges were included, it would not mean that all consumables had to be included, as there is no campaign for other consumables, such as batteries or CDs, to be included.

There are a number of key questions. Are consumables specifically included or excluded from the WEEE directive, or is that just the Government's interpretation? On what basis are printer cartridges deemed to be consumables? Does the directive provide the Government with the scope to include cartridges if they choose to do so? That last question is absolutely critical, because if the directive allows printer cartridges to be included, the Government must explain why they refuse to do so. I understand that as the directive is a minimum harmonisation measure it does indeed allow the Government to include cartridges.

I have made the point about whether cartridges are consumables, or whether the WEEE directive has been disputed by European legal and technical experts. According to Cornelius and Judge, in an article in the June 2003 edition of Imaging Spectrum magazine, modern printer cartridges are dependent on electrical currents and electromagnetic fields to work properly and are to be considered as IT and telecommunications equipment. They therefore should qualify as electrical and electronic equipment and should be considered under the WEEE directive. In effect, that means that although a printer has to be recycled, the printer cartridges that it uses do not. However, a printer is of no use without a printer cartridge; they are inseparable items and pieces of equipment.

The volume of waste from cartridges over the normal life cycle of the printer is 10 times that of the printer. The implication is that if cartridges cannot be considered as equipment, there may be severe environmental consequences and they are likely to end up in landfill sites rather than being remanufactured and reused. Such a practice is environmentally damaging and contrary to Government policy on sustainability and waste management, particularly the September 2003 publication "Changing Patterns: UK Government Framework for Sustainable Consumption and Production". Yet the Government state that they want to support the recycling of cartridges.

I wrote to every Department asking for their policy on recycling. The responses were interesting—varied but encouraging. My hon. Friend the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services stated:

"I agree that the remanufacture and recycling of printer cartridges is important for the environment and the safeguard of the remanufacturing industry. We have a system in place whereby used cartridges are deposited at dedicated collection points, local at several points on each floor of our buildings. The cartridges are collected on behalf of our stationery supplier. Wherever possible, these cartridges are reused and made available as products re-branded by our supplier."

The Serjeant at Arms also gave me an encouraging answer, as did Baroness Amos at the House of Lords, and an Under-Secretary from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. The Department of Health provided the only disappointing response. A reply from an official stated:

"After consideration your letter has been passed to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs who have responsibility for these matters and they will reply to you directly."

That missed the point of the request, which was to ask the Department of Health what its policy was, not about wider Government policy.

In conclusion, the Government are clearly committed to recycling and the minimisation of waste, and Departments have indicated their support for recycling printer cartridges. I acknowledge that the subject is complicated and that the Minister has received much representation. I understand that his Department recently held meetings with both sides of the debate—the original equipment manufacturers and the remanufacturers—and I would be grateful if he could comment on the outcome of those discussions.

I urge the Minister to consider the position of the cartridge remanufacturing industry and the threat it is under from the use of anti-remanufacturing devices and other anti-competitive practices. Will he also state whether he believes that the EUP directive will protect the industry? How can he guarantee that and will it come into force in time?

The issue has been drawn to my attention because of the threat to a company in my constituency. I raise the matter on behalf of the 100-odd employees of LaserXchange, but also on behalf of thousands of individuals who want the right to buy recycled equipment for use with their computers and printers at home and at work, and of all those groups and individuals committed to the principles of recycling and sustainability. Encouraging recycling and the ending of anti-competitive practices that thwart the industry is in the interests of consumers, businesses and the environment. I urge the Minister to consider the points that I have made.

4.30 pm

The Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services (Mr. Stephen Timms) rose—

Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West) (Lab/Co-op): I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Minister would give way before he starts speaking.

Mr. Timms: I give way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is a strange way of doing things, but the hon. Gentleman may carry on.

Dr. Naysmith: I intervene because we have an interesting situation, with two constituencies containing manufacturers of printer cartridges. Hewlett Packard is a major manufacturer and employer in my constituency. It is a high-tech industry—an example of the sort of employer that we attract. I want to reinforce the point made my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards): Hewlett Packard does not use so-called killer chips, or any other device to prevent the refilling or remanufacturing of cartridges, nor does it seek to inhibit the activities of that industry. It tells me that it supports the right of consumers to choose its products in that field, or to recycle products from other manufacturers, and believes that it can compete successfully on quality. Of course, that is a matter for the consumer. I hope that the Minister will take those comments into account in his reply.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take advice on how best to make such an intervention in future.

Mr. Timms: I am grateful for the opportunity to respond to what has been said. I am particularly grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards), who has followed this issue with great interest and energy, and played an important part in drawing it to the attention of a wider audience.

This important issue has aroused strong feelings. In recent months, I have received many parliamentary questions—some of which were from my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth—and an extremely large number of letters from hon. Members on this matter, which I take seriously.

It is important to note at the start that cartridge refilling is flourishing in the UK. About one third of the printer cartridges sold have been refilled. There is nothing in planned legislation that would put that at risk. I am told that a large expansion of the recycling operations is proposed. For example, one of the companies that my hon. Friend mentioned, Cartridge World, which has 210 outlets, lists on its website the sites where it plans to add another 90 locations. That will increase its number of outlets by 40 per cent.

Clearly, nothing in current regulation or technology is proving to be a barrier to the growth of that activity. I am pleased about that, because I agree with my hon. Friend about the important benefits of cartridge recycling, such as extra competition in the market, and environmental benefits. I am grateful to him for referring to the framework for sustainable consumption and production, which I launched with my noble Friend

[Mr. Timms]

Lord Whitty last year. The framework sets out important aspirations on which the Government, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs work together.

The independent printer cartridge refill sector has raised concerns that innovation in cartridge technology could make competition harder. At the heart of the issue is the question whether third-party refilling will be made more difficult. Two things are clear. First, the issues surrounding the development of chip technology in printer cartridges and the reuse of chipped cartridges are complex and certainly not as clear-cut as some think.

Secondly, the Government have been worried by the absence of a dialogue between independent refillers and equipment manufacturers, such as Hewlett Packard. I am pleased to be able to tell the Chamber that DTI and DEFRA officials were able to bring together representatives of the United Kingdom Cartridge Remanufacturers Association with several of the leading manufacturers last week. The meeting was held in confidence, at the request of both sides, but it was the beginning of what I hope will prove to be a constructive discussion between the parties on those issues. Both parties told us that they found the meeting helpful, and there are high hopes that the dialogue can be taken forward so that there can be more of a common understanding of the issues surrounding cartridge reuse. I have arranged to meet UKCRA representatives on 29 April to take that discussion further.

UKCRA has pressed the Government to use the WEEE directive to address its concerns. The directive was agreed in February 2003 and is due to be transposed into UK law this summer. It sets requirements for the separate collection, treatment and recycling of electrical and electronic equipment and makes the producers—manufacturers and importers—of that equipment responsible for meeting the costs of those activities.

UKCRA has asked the Government to use the directive to address the killer chip issue. It argues that cartridge manufacturers would have to comply with the product design requirements of the directive which aim to prevent manufacturers from designing out reuse and recycling. The cartridge refillers are concerned that, in a fast-moving market, it would be difficult to source replacements for chips used by cartridge manufacturers, although they might be replaced and the cartridge reused. The refillers have said that they are concerned that the increased rate of technological development in that context will squeeze them out of the market, as the chips will become more difficult or more expensive for them to replace.

I believe that it is important to make a distinction between killer chips and other types of smart chip, although I agree with my hon. Friend that this is rather a fraught area in which to reach consensus on a definition. I suggest that a killer chip is one that is designed to burn out the print-head mechanism of a cartridge so that it cannot be used again. As far as I know, only one manufacturer has developed and patented such a killer chip. However, I am assured that that chip has not been used in any products on the market.

Smart chips are often used to enhance the performance of cartridges for consumers; for example, they may assist in monitoring ink or toner levels in a cartridge. Their purpose is to provide an additional benefit to the user, and not to render the cartridge unrecyclable. Such chips do not prevent the refilling or reuse of the cartridge, although they may not be so easy to reset without proper equipment, to which refillers may not always have access.

We will continue to monitor the use of chip technology in cartridges.

According to our information, the technology for killer chips exists but there are currently none on the market, and there are no strong grounds for believing that that situation is about to change. Customer demand for more information on cartridge performance, partly driven by an investigation by the Office of Fair Trading into the pricing of new cartridges, has led to an increase in the use of smart chips in the past few years, and no doubt that trend will continue. However, so far, there is no sign of the sector's growth being seriously impeded by that trend.

I agree with my hon. Friend on the benefits of recycling, and I am keen to see those benefits harnessed. The refilling and remarketing of cartridges helps to mitigate environmental damage. There is a healthy refill industry in the UK, and I want to see that continue. I made the point earlier that reused cartridges currently represent just over 30 per cent. of the replacement cartridges on the market today. As my hon. Friend said, the DTI has a policy of actively encouraging the reuse of our printer cartridges.

The Government have a good deal of sympathy with the views of the cartridge remanufacturing industry. Many of the companies involved in that industry are small businesses competing with large manufacturers; they provide a valuable service, which gives real environmental benefits and minimises waste. They also help in providing consumers with a wider choice of cartridges than might otherwise be the case and, as my hon. Friend illustrated, often at lower prices. I also agree with him about the benefits from their support for charities.

However, the WEEE directive is not the right way to address concerns about competition in this area. The directive is based on article 175 of the EU treaty, which deals with environmental protection, and it might technically be possible for us to add cartridges to the scope of our UK implementation. However, I suspect that if we did we would be open to challenge because—this is the view of the specialists whose advice I have access to—it is very hard to define a cartridge as a piece of electrical or electronic equipment. There is certainly no requirement to do that in the directive, and I have not seen a strong case for gold plating the directive in the way implied.

I shall set out why that would not be helpful. First, there is a legal view that the directive applies to whole products placed on the market, not individual components or consumables. Computer memory chips, graphics cards, CD-ROM drives and others are in the same category. They need to be recycled only at the end of their life while still retained in the whole device, and it is the producer of the original whole product who is responsible, not the manufacturer of each component. It is clear that printer cartridges fall into that category, and the European Commission takes that view as well.

Secondly, the printer cartridge remanufacturing industry needs to consider the other effects on its operations of including printer cartridges in the scope of the directive. There are obvious cost implications for the manufacturers of the cartridges, which would need to take on the directive's producer responsibility obligations for supporting collection and recovery of the cartridges sold to domestic consumers. That would be likely to mean that the original equipment manufacturers had a strong incentive to take back cartridges when supplying new ones, which they would then have to reuse or recycle themselves instead of those cartridges being available to recyclers.

Lastly, printer cartridge remanufactures may become obligated under the WEEE directive. They would be liable for the end-of-life costs for any cartridges they refilled and put back on to the market. They would have to fulfil the various registration requirements and provide financial guarantees for the future recovery of their products. All those factors would mean that there would be fewer cartridges available for the remanufacturers to refurbish, and the refilling industry would have to take on a number of additional burdens that it does not currently have.

All cartridges currently on the market are capable of being refilled and reused, which I welcome. We are currently considering the approach that we should take to the implementation of the directive's provisions to require that producers do not prevent reuse of products in the scope of the directive. We are weighing the fact that the majority of respondents to our recent consultation on implementation supported our proposals for a voluntary non-legislative approach, with a suggestion of a business forum to consider eco-design.

Should killer chips appear on the market, the right way forward would be for the Office of Fair Trading to examine evidence of abuse on competition grounds. I am not convinced that a smart chip used on a cartridge to tell a user the ink levels in the cartridge is an anti-reuse or anti-competition device. It seems to be a useful innovation, and I would be reluctant to see legislation passed against such innovation on the basis of the evidence that we have seen so far.

Mr. Edwards: Will my hon. Friend accept that some of the smart chips will be smarter than we are assuming? They are likely to become more sophisticated. I wonder whether the Minister has visited any remanufacturing plants himself. Would he like to come to LaserXchange in Abergavenny?

Mr. Timms: I have not yet had the opportunity to visit one of the plants, but I am looking forward to a meeting next month with UKCRA. I am not in a position to accept my hon. Friend's kind invitation, but I will certainly bear it mind.

I think that my hon. Friend would agree that we should not use the directive to hold back the sort of technological improvements that are appearing in the industry, which some of those chips do provide in printer cartridges. If there is an issue of competition, it should be addressed in another way. The energy products directive that he mentioned is currently being negotiated and that would be—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

It being fifteen minutes to Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 1 April 2004

[SIR NICHOLAS WINTERTON in the Chair]

Cetaceans

[Relevant documents: Third Report from the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee 2003–04 HC88]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Ainger.]

2.30 pm

Ms Candy Atherton (Falmouth and Camborne) (Lab): I am pleased to be debating cetacean by-catch, the subject of the report of the Select Committee on the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. The issue is urgent. Since the new year, more than 124 dead cetaceans have been recorded on the Cornish coast. It could be called a death tide. We are talking about the death of one of the most popular mammals.

A quick search of Hansard on the subject of cetacean by-catch is informative. For many years, the subject was barely mentioned, although my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Mr. Banks) stands out as a persistent voice of concern, as he has on so many animal welfare issues.

First, I shall deal with the Select Committee's inquiry, which I was privileged to chair. I shall deal next with the recently announced European Union regulations; and then the Government's response to the report, which arrived only last night. The Committee was fortunate in that some leading experts gave evidence. They include people who represent fishing organisations and the sea fisheries committees, as well as conservationists such as Nick Tregenza from Cornwall, and representatives of wildlife trusts, the Whale and Dolphin Conservation Society and Brixham seawatch. We are grateful to all who gave evidence for their time and their expertise. I also record my thanks to the Select Committee Clerk, who worked so hard on the report.

The Committee welcomed the publication of the Government's strategy. We recognise that concerted action within the EU is necessary and that EU law restricts what the Government can do alone. However, we want the Government to do more. Had the Government and the EU followed our recommendations, a great deal more would have been achieved to protect small cetaceans; but the impact on fishing would have been relatively small, as the costs would have qualified for EU grants. Sadly, neither the Government nor the EU proposed anything like the protection that the Committee recommended.

I shall now outline the background to the Committee's recommendations. The UK is party to several agreements to protect the populations of small cetaceans from by-catch. One is the agreement on the conservation of small cetaceans of the Baltic and North seas—otherwise known as ASCOBANS, which sounds like something from Harry Potter. Others include the European convention habitat directive and the United Nations convention on the law of the sea.

As the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pointed out in its response on UK small cetacean by-catch, marine mammals are particularly vulnerable to depletion from by-catch. By-catch is widely recognised as one of the most serious environmental problems resulting from modern commercial fishing. The treaties that I mentioned recognise that by-catch above 1.7 per cent. of the fish population would lead to population decline. ASCOBANS went further: acting in accordance with the precautionary principle, it set an objective to reduce by-catch to below 1 per cent. of the best available population estimate.

Estimating the population and the by-catch is difficult. Estimates suggest a population of about 150,000 harbour porpoises; between 300 and 500 bottle-nosed dolphins; and 75,000 common dolphins off the UK coast. Estimates of by-catch are complicated by a number of factors. Many carcases probably sink or decompose at sea without trace. The by-catch washed ashore could be the tip of the iceberg.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Was the hon. Lady not concerned to read recent reports that a number of carcases that were washed up had holes in them, the presumption being that the carcases were holed in the hope that they would sink and not be included in the count?

Ms Atherton: Yes; that is one of the grave allegations that have been made. The Government need to pay attention to the fact that many carcases are lost and decompose at sea.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): My hon. Friend is making a powerful case about the conservation issue, but does she agree that what has just been said shows that there is also an important animal welfare issue? "The Net Effect", the report by the Whale and Dolphin Conservation Society for Greenpeace, states that the injuries suffered by by-catch dolphins and porpoises

"typically include bruising, muscular tearing, broken beaks, torn and severed fins and flukes and cuts and abrasions on the skin".

Ms Atherton: My hon. Friend is perfectly correct. For the Select Committee, one of the most distressing parts of taking evidence was seeing photographs and pictures that showed the impact on dolphins. The public do not see such things because they take place out at sea. Their only manifestation is when we see dolphins and porpoises washed up on the beaches. That is when the issue comes into the public domain. There is a strong animal welfare issue.

Over 10 days in 2002, more than 300 dolphins and porpoises were washed ashore on the French Atlantic coast. The majority showed signs of having been caught in fishing nets in the exact conditions that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) describes. Sadly, French public opinion has not been mobilised on this issue. We need to mobilise public opinion across the European Union, as it has been mobilised in this country.

The autopsies indicate by-catch as the cause of death in 30 per cent. of cases among harbour porpoises and two thirds of cases among common dolphins. In 2002,

[Ms Atherton]

655 cetacean strandings were reported and preliminary data for last year indicated more than 650 cetacean strandings. In the Celtic sea, by-catch of the harbour porpoise is a serious problem. The porpoise appears particularly susceptible to being caught in bottom-set gill nets set in coastal waters. Estimates suggest that the by-catch of the fishery for hake between 1992 and 1994 was 6.2 per cent. of the local population of harbour porpoises, although levels of by-catch have probably declined as the size of the hake fleet has declined.

In the North sea, the fisheries of other countries have had a bigger impact on harbour porpoises. Bottom-set gill nets laid by Danish vessels alone are estimated to have killed nearly 5,600 porpoises between 1987 and 2001. That is estimated to be 3.3 per cent. of the local population. The UK fleet was estimated to be responsible for the by-catch of approximately 1,000 animals in 1995. As the fleet reduced, that figure reduced to about 600 in 2000.

We receive few estimates of the numbers of common dolphins killed as a result of by-catch. However, in February 2002, the then fisheries Minister, who is now Minister for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), said that he believed that up to 50 dolphins a day were being killed in the pelagic trawl fishery for sea bass. The Wildlife Trust estimated the figure to be between 2 and 3.5 per cent. of the local population. In the UK, by-catch of common dolphins occurs predominantly off the south-west coast of England during the winter months. I have to tell the House that I now dread the start of winter, when the slaughter of dolphins begins.

There are various ways in which small cetacean by-catch might be reduced. They include the use of acoustic pingers on certain set-net fisheries, which are effective at warning small cetaceans away; the introduction of separator grids into pelagic fisheries, which allows small cetaceans to escape; closing a fishery if by-catch exceeds a certain percentage of the relevant population; and designating special areas of conservation under the habitats directive.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): When it comes to closing fisheries because a certain percentage of cetaceans have been caught, how would that be monitored? What percentage would be taken? Would the percentage reflect the cetaceans that were washed up on the shore, or would there be a calculation of how many cetaceans were dying, but not being washed up on the shore?

Ms Atherton: That is a good question. At the moment, we do not know how many cetaceans are being caught or the size of the populations. I will make the case for closing certain fisheries, but I will come to that later. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will wait until I get further on in my speech.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend confirm that, by taking us through the Select Committee recommendations she is, in a sense, outlining the options that were presented to DEFRA? In order to address the specific point about the stage at which we identify a proportion as unacceptable, it might be helpful for her to remind us that she was the one person on the Committee who said that we had already reached that point and that there was a compelling case for a six-month emergency ban.

Ms Atherton: My hon. Friend is kind. I was particularly keen that the Committee should consider the matter. I wanted action, and as I shall say later, the Committee members wanted immediate action, but were persuaded to take the DEFRA response options. I am trying to describe the process by which we came to our conclusions. We wanted to give DEFRA those options, but I now feel—I hope that colleagues agree—that we need to move on, given what the EU Fisheries Council has concluded.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Atherton: I am delighted to give way to the Chairman of our Select Committee.

Mr. Jack: Will the hon. Lady confirm that one of the many important recommendations in the report was the need for better research further to inform the work that she has ably described so far, which should be principally conducted by DEFRA?

Ms Atherton: We were strongly of that view and the Chairman of the Committee is quite right. We were appalled at the lack of information. We felt that more needed to be done, and more is being done. I look forward to the data that the Minister might be able to give in his response. Now, if hon. Members would be kind enough to allow me, I had better make some progress.

I hope that hon. Members read our report, but I would like to talk a little about the areas considered and the particular methods that could be used. We welcomed DEFRA's proposals to make pingers compulsory, but we were concerned about the restrictions that it proposed on the limits. DEFRA said that pingers should be mandatory in the Celtic sea, but only on gill nets more than 6 nautical miles from the coast. Apart from the impracticality of enforcing that, there is good evidence from countries where more intensive observer monitoring of gill net fisheries has been carried out that inshore nets catch porpoises just as effectively as offshore nets. The Committee therefore recommended that pingers be made mandatory on all bottom-set gill nets in the Celtic sea as well as the North sea.

DEFRA has made no recommendations to introduce pingers in the English channel on the basis that the by-catch is negligible as there are very few porpoises. We accept the view of the conservation organisations that the decline of the cetacean populations to such low levels in the English channel is the precise reason why measures to limit gill-net fishing are required to allow them to recover. We therefore recommended the use of pingers on gill nets in the English channel. We were concerned that the Government had supplied insufficient information on how effective pinger operation would be measured and where inspection would take place. We urge the Government to provide answers to those questions as soon as possible.

We also recommended that the Government give serious consideration to prohibiting completely bottom-set gill nets in those areas if pingers were proven to exclude harbour porpoises from key habitats to the detriment of those populations. The recently agreed EU directive makes pingers compulsory only on fishing vessels over 12 m using fixed gear in the North sea, the English channel and the Celtic sea. The date for implementing the mandatory use of pingers has been postponed from 2005 to 2007 depending on the fishing area and gear used. I believe that that is very worrying. I recommend that the Government accept the recommendations in the report in respect of UK-registered vessels.

Let me turn to the pelagic trawls, which are implicated in the deaths of so many common dolphins. A typical pelagic pair trawl involves a stretch net large enough to cover the Sydney opera house pulled between two boats. The largest could hold 10 jumbo jets. There is clear evidence that the sea bass pelagic trawl is the primary cause of death of common dolphins as a result of by-catch. Trials of separator grids have been encouraging and we commended DEFRA for funding those trials over several seasons of the sea bass fishery. However, if by-catch in the sea bass fishery is to be addressed effectively, action must be taken at European level. The United Kingdom Government are prevented by the common fisheries policy from imposing restrictions on other UK-registered vessels that are more stringent than any restrictions already imposed by the European Commission.

It is extraordinary that we do not know the size of the sea bass fleet of different countries. The National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations estimated that there are 60 French vessels working in 30 pairs, fewer than 10 Dutch vessels, which are large and do not work in pairs, and between two and six Scottish pair teams.

Mr. Sanders: I understand that there are at least 12 Scottish vessels currently working out of Plymouth, so those figures are somewhat suspect.

Ms Atherton: That is the point.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Six pairs.

Ms Atherton: Yes, six pairs. I am trying to make the point that there is no real knowledge of the numbers and the Committee found that extraordinary. We felt that there should be more information, which should come not just from the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations but should be known at EU level. How can we tackle the problem if we do not know the size of it?

Mr. Gray: The hon. Lady is making a powerful point. If the position we are in today is a result of the common fisheries policy, surely it would be better if the UK were able to act independently. We could then take a lead and perhaps declare a complete ban on trawling in pairs, which might lead us to repatriate the common fisheries policy here. Surely the situation would be better than it is at the moment.

Ms Atherton: I had a feeling that the Conservative party might rise to the bait. If we went down the route proposed by the Conservative party, there would be a free-for-all and all cetaceans would be in greater peril than if we acted collectively.

The prospective Conservative candidate in my constituency recently held a press conference. I was contacted by a television company which told me that the candidate was accusing me and was very cross because we were not calling for separator grids or pingers. He had not read the report, which was not a good way to start, and his comments ended up on the cutting room floor. It was interesting.

The Select Committee recommended that the Government should aim to reduce by-catch of the common dolphin in the pelagic trawl fishery for sea bass to within 1.7 per cent. by the end of two fishing seasons from now. The Committee and I have been criticised for that, but we took the view that the Department should be allowed to pursue its plans and to work at European level for the reasons that I have described. We urged the Government to work towards convincing other member states to adopt mandatory use of grids in the sea bass fishery if the current separator trials proved successful. We recommended that, if other member states did not agree to deploy separator grids or take other effective mitigating action to reduce the cetacean by-catch, the Government should make a formal request to the European Commission to impose emergency measures in the form of closure of the pelagic trawl fishery for sea bass.

There is some evidence of by-catch in pelagic trawl fisheries other than sea bass, but insufficient monitoring has been carried out, so it is impossible to know the full extent.

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): On separator grids, I am sure that the hon. Lady is aware that fishermen in my part of the country are saying that the grids are misplaced and not effective. The dolphins that escape through them show clear signs of severe damage. Photographs taken of the recent massing of porpoises off Cornwall show clear evidence of substantial damage to a large number of dolphins. They were not killed by the nets but were damaged by them, including, for example, a dolphin with its entire dorsal fin ripped off. Some people argue that the majority of dolphins show signs of damage. I hope that the hon. Lady will accept that the use of the grids is by no means proven to be effective in a fishery that risks destroying the bass stocks as well as the dolphins.

Ms Atherton: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. The fishermen to whom I have spoken are considering all sorts of measures to try to solve the problem. Many of them do not want a situation in which both the fish stocks and the dolphin stocks are depleted. I accept that more work has to be done.

We recommend that the Government place much greater emphasis on moving quickly to set up long-term observer monitoring programmes for other pelagic trawl fisheries that take place off south-west England in the winter months, such as those for mackerel, horse mackerel and tuna. The fact is that fishermen, dolphins and porpoises all hunt the same prey—fish—and that is why these tragedies occur.

I am concerned that the EU regulation does not ban certain practices or make any recommendation on the use of devices to mitigate cetacean by-catch in the pelagic trawl fishery, but instead only recommends that observers monitor the by-catch until the review of the regulation in 2008. I believe that the public will be astonished by that. Not even to agree that separator grids should be used is quite wrong and leads me to conclude that we shall have to explore different solutions.

There is widespread support among conservation organisations for the introduction of a mortality limit scheme set at a limit of 1 per cent. of the available population. Even so, we agreed with DEFRA that to be successful such a scheme would have to be agreed upon and implemented at the European level. A single member state could not unilaterally implement such a scheme because it would require the co-operation of all the member states involved in a particular fishery. We therefore recommend that the Government pursue discussions about the introduction of a mortality limit scheme at the European level, particularly for sea bass. Such a scheme could provide a long-term management solution for the fishery if agreement between all member states prosecuting the fishery could be achieved.

The UK has identified three candidate special areas of conservation—SACs—that could offer protection for the bottle-nosed dolphin. No SACs have been identified for the harbour porpoise because of the difficulty in identifying the areas that they inhabit. I understand that further work is under way; perhaps the Minister could confirm that. We consider that such SACs should be considered a matter of priority.

Part of the consideration of whether restrictions should be imposed on fisheries is the question of whether they would be legal. The nub of the issue is the interaction between the habitats directive and the CFP. Under the CFP, the restriction of fisheries for conservation reasons is a function that falls within the exclusive competence of the European Commission. Consequently, it is not at all clear whether the UK Government are legally able to impose restrictions on fishing activities in SACs. If the Commission concludes that member states are not able to impose such restrictions, other action must be taken at European level to ensure that the protection offered to marine species in SACs is meaningful. I understand that DEFRA has yet to receive a response from the Commission on the matter, despite the nine months that have elapsed since the UK raised the issue. Can the Minister confirm whether the Government have heard from the Commission yet? We urge them to pursue the matter.

As I mentioned earlier, the European Union Fisheries Council has only just reached agreement on EU action. In July 2003, the Commission adopted a draft regulation to curb small cetacean by-catch. It went through a process of scrutiny and negotiation in Council working groups that included civil servants from member states and the fisheries committee of the European Parliament and then the European Parliament itself. The Fisheries Council reached final political agreement on a new regulation only after arduous negotiations on 22 March. The regulation is meant to be a short-term first step towards addressing the by-catch problem. The Commission and the committee agreed that independent observers were vital, and the Commission proposed that member states set up as a matter of priority on-board observer schemes to monitor the incidental capture and killing of cetaceans in several high-risk fisheries where pelagic trawls or gill nets are used.

The draft regulation has been considerably watered down in its final form. As I have said, pingers will be mandatory only on vessels of more than 12 m using fixed-net gear in the three seas, and fisheries using pingers will not be subject to the on-board observer scheme. The date for implementing pingers has changed from 2005 to 2007. That wait-and-see approach will see thousands more porpoises and dolphins and possibly whole populations dying needlessly. It is disappointing to say the least that, in an area where concerted action is needed at EU level, the EU has singularly failed to deliver an effective solution.

There is undoubtedly a need for a comprehensive scheme to monitor by-catch, so that long-term measures can be designed to be as effective as possible. However, EU member states have been under the obligation imposed in article 12.4 of the habitats directive to monitor the incidental capture and killing of cetaceans for a long time, and they have failed to do so. Under current proposals, the cetacean population will continue to pay a high price for the inaction and failure of member states to meet their legal obligations.

Alan Simpson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Ms Atherton: I am aware that I am going on longer than I intended, but I am happy to give way to my hon. Friend.

Alan Simpson: I want my hon. Friend to focus on one point. She makes a very powerful case, but, without wishing in any way to detract from the importance of monitoring, given the evidence of the scale of by-catch casualties and carnage, is the question not about the enforcement of emergency measures? As a Government and Parliament, do we not need to face the question of what lead the Government can take in delivering the pressure and demands for emergency measures, rather than sitting back within the safe but marginal area of the research and monitoring regime?

Ms Atherton: My hon. Friend is, once again, quite correct and, if he will allow me to complete my argument, which he has foreseen with great foresight, he will be pleased with my conclusion. It concurs with his own.

There is already abundant evidence that the trawl fishery and, particularly the sea bass fishery, is killing cetaceans at a level that the population cannot sustain, and in breach of the legally binding ASCOBANS agreement. The nub of the issue is contained in article 7 of the European regulation on the conservation of fisheries, which says:

> "If there is a serious threat to the conservation of living aquatic resources or to the marine ecosystem resulting from fishing activities, which requires immediate action, the Commission, at the substantiated request of a Member State or on its own initiative, may decide on emergency measures which shall last not more than one year."

The Government took similar action recently in relation to the coral reefs known as the Darwin mounds off Rockall. A decision can be made within 15 days and emergency measures have immediate effect.

The possible use of article 7 to protect cetaceans appears to have been ignored in the DEFRA response strategy, which refers only to the weaker powers for emergency closure of a fishery under article 8. The time has come for the Government to apply to the European Commission for the use of article 7 to close the sea bass fishery from the beginning of the next season in November. No dead dolphins next season would conclusively make the point.

Another conservation and fisherman-friendly policy would be to exempt those vessels in the sea bass fishery that use separated grids and other conservation-friendly methods. I ask the Government urgently to seek legal opinion about what is possible and to apply to the Commission for closure.

Further information on populations and by-catch levels should be forthcoming in the next year. As an interim measure, the European Commission has funded a voluntary observer scheme, putting their observers on the pelagic trawl. Unfortunately that missed most of this winter, when the problem is at its biggest. Observers on British boats are reporting that they are catching far too many dolphins, although numerical data have not been reported. The Greenpeace boat Esperanza has been patrolling the coast off Cornwall this winter and produced photographs of dolphins following the sea bass fishery. Another major survey of cetacean populations called SCANS II is planned for 2004.

Article 7 will allow up to 18 months' breathing space to find a longer-term solution based on the better data. Waiting till 2008 for the formal review of the EU regulation on by-catch with no guarantee of any mitigation methods to reduce by-catch in pelagic trawls is unsatisfactory.

Matthew Taylor: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Atherton: I am sorry, but I am just finishing and I have been generous with hon. Members throughout.

The EU has the ability to act before 2008 under existing powers. More data will become available that will enable further informed decisions to be made. Our Committee wanted to see the slaughter end. We were prepared to give the Government and the EU space to put the various schemes into operation on a limited time span. I believe, however, that the watered-down plans from the EU mean that the Government have to take action to safeguard the dolphins and porpoises for the future. I urge the Government to act.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) on her report and its conclusions. I will concentrate on one small aspect of it, which goes to the heart of the issue: the point at which action is taken. One per cent. of the population has been mentioned as the trigger for action, as it puts the sustainability of the population in question. One per cent. does not sound like much, but, to put it in human terms, if 1 per cent. of the population of the United Kingdom dropped dead for some unknown reason, that would be 580,000 people, and we can be sure that, if we knew what the reason was, action would be taken immediately.

What we know about by-catch deaths of cetaceans is drawn from those that are washed up on the shore. It is suggested that 1 per cent. of the bottle-nosed dolphin population is 50, and nobody claims that 50 bottle-nosed dolphins have been washed up on our beaches in any one year. Even if we took into account the figures from north-west France as well as south-west England, we would reach nowhere near 1 per cent. However, we are close to the threshold for the common dolphin. Last year, more than 600 were found on the beaches of north-west France and of south-west England—close to the 750 figure that would be 1 per cent.

As the hon. Lady mentioned, and as I mentioned yesterday, the by-catch that we record on the shoreline is probably only a fraction of the actual by-catch. The fishermen know that the dolphin is a protected species, and they do not want to admit that they have caught them. There are examples of pelagic trawl operators cutting up the dolphins in order, they hope, that they would sink to the bottom of the sea and not be recorded. That is why it was obvious that one of the initiatives required was observers on boats. Of course that is a voluntary scheme and not all pelagic trawl operators want observers to see precisely what is going on. However, we are dangerously close to that 1 per cent. figure, and we might already have exceeded it.

Matthew Taylor: Is not the key issue with bass pair trawling the fact that, as well as apparently killing large numbers of cetaceans—I certainly agree with my hon. Friend's argument that the problem is getting beyond the trigger level for a species that does not reproduce quickly—the technique is wiping out the bass fishery? It is not a sustainable fishery, irrespective of the problems with dolphins and porpoises. That is why it is so hard to understand why the Government are not taking the lead in pressing to put a stop to that form of bass fishery, especially given that few British boats are involved in it. I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) was suggesting the closure of all bass fishery in her conclusion, or just that that technique be stopped. Given that the fishery is unsustainable, the Government should be pressing for closure irrespective of the trigger levels.

Mr. Sanders: I agree with my hon. Friend. We should be asking for closure of that particular method of fishing, not of the entire fishery for bass. Perhaps the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne can make it clear that we are talking about the closure of pelagic pair trawling—

Ms Atherton: Of course I want to make that clear.

Mr. Sanders: I am grateful to the hon. Lady. In that case, we are at one on the issue. Observations and representations are coming from hand-line bass fishermen, who are as concerned as anyone else about by-catch levels and the sustainability of stocks of bass, for which they fish legitimately and without any by-catch.

I conclude that the trigger point is the crucial part of the argument. The Government need to address that. I know that part of their response will be that we need more verifiable evidence. The evidence that has washed up on our shoreline has been subjected to post-mortems at Regent's Park zoo, in which the cause of death of those creatures has been found irrefutably to be by-catch. Those numbers are well in excess of 1 per cent. of the population if the lower estimates are accepted—the figures that I gave earlier were at the higher end of the range—and therefore endorse what the hon. Lady says, and what I said in the Chamber yesterday: we need to ban this method of bass fishing without delay.

3.8 pm

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) and the other members of the Select Committee on their work. I further congratulate my hon. Friend on her clear and powerful opening presentation.

It is probably no coincidence that half of the Members present come from the south-west peninsula, although not all of them have a shoreline in their constituency. We have a great appreciation of the benefits of having such a wonderful marine coastline in the south-west, and I think that we all share not only concern but enthusiasm for the marine wildlife in which we are so rich.

I have the good fortune to have in my constituency the national marine aquarium, which many people may not have heard of before last weekend's event, when HMS Scylla—the last Leander-class frigate to be built in Plymouth—was placed as an artificial reef in Whitsand bay. Following that project by the aquarium, many more people in the UK and further abroad will now have heard of that centre of excellence, and will know of our aspirations that Plymouth should become a sport diving centre of excellence and tourism for the south-west.

I confess that I missed the boat: having played a major part in bringing the project to a conclusion, I found myself at Mayflower steps in Plymouth at a quarter to 2, but the boat had left at half-past 1. I have not investigated how that came to be, but I was able to phone for assistance and a fast rigid inflatable was sent for me. Juan Romero, who was driving it, said to me, "I hope you don't mind speed." I did not tell him that although I represent a marine constituency, I have occasionally been known to be seasick on a pontoon, never mind on a boat. Nevertheless, we sped from the Mayflower steps to Whitsand bay in about five minutes. Anyone who knows the area will realise that we were going at a considerable speed.

We made it in time to join the waiting party and then had to wait an hour for the right conditions to sink the boat. On the way—this is relevant, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I am pleased to say that dolphins were spied in Plymouth sound.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I can tell the hon. Lady that even the Chair is attracted by a good story.

Linda Gilroy: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Not only are dolphins highly regarded and one of our favourite forms of marine wildlife; they are considered to be harbingers of good luck. We hope that that sighting brings good luck to the project.

The UK has many aquariums, but the national marine aquarium is the first to come into being solely for the purpose of education, conservation and research. Research is an important aspect. The centre has had more than 1.5 million visitors, but it has also become firmly established as a source of reliable and accurate information. It is also a regular source for newspaper, magazine and television projects, including the well-known BBC "Blue Planet" series, which deals with everything from seahorses—my favourite—to whales. The cause of dolphin and porpoise strandings is of great interest to the aquarium.

As has been said, it is more than 10 years since reports of dolphin strandings became an all-too-frequent and extremely unwelcome feature of local and regional news reports. That increase seems to have become associated with the increase in fishing for sea bass. Various trials and proposals have been suggested to mitigate that tragic and unintended cull. The Select Committee investigated it in considerable detail and proposed limiting the by-catch to 1.7 per cent. of the estimated population, but it spoke also of the difficulty of working out what the population might be. Technical proposals, observer monitoring and closing the fisheries have all been suggested.

Criticism has already been made of the trials that DEFRA has put in hand, but I pay tribute to the Department because it has taken a lead in recognising the serious nature of the problem and the reality of the approach and attitude of other European Union member states. We shall doubtless hear from the Minister what has been achieved at the European level, what constraints were imposed on making agreements and what is the potential for moving on.

Hon. Members have already indicated the great interest of many fishermen in the subject. They are often seen as the bogeymen, but many of them take a keen interest in the conservation issues that affect marine habitats, despite the fact that fisheries are under great stress and in decline in many ways.

I was very interested to read on page 42 of the evidence to the Select Committee that Mr. Barrie Deas acknowledged the very serious problem of dolphins. He says:

"Our view is that every attempt should be made to quickly establish whether acoustic deterrent devices and/or escape windows are effective in reducing dolphin bycatch. In the absence of rapid progress we would not oppose a more restrictive approach, up to and including a prohibition of this fishing method"— the pair trawling method—

"for bass."

In passing, I point out that the conclusion of the memorandum presented to the Committee raised the interesting concept, which I have not come across before in reference to fishing, of a possible role for fishermen as stewards of the marine environment parallel to that emerging for farmers as stewards of the countryside. That was not one of the Committee's recommendations, but will the Minister, in his concluding remarks, say whether DEFRA is considering such a role? I would greatly welcome its doing so, as the proposal is very interesting. That is certainly borne out by the symbiotic and constructive relationship between many fishermen and the researchers at the national marine aquarium in Plymouth, which carries out marine conservation activities.

The Select Committee report made two broad points that were very much reflected in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne. The first is that we need to recognise the urgency of the situation and the fears of those who believe that it may be too late to consider any more sophisticated proposals if we do not act soon. I tend to agree. I believe that calls for the closure of the winter pair trawling fishery are merited and should be seriously considered, although I appreciate that that might cause problems, which the Minister will doubtless outline to us. We should not delude ourselves that we will be immune from the moving goalpost syndrome that we all come across when trying to tackle problems. If we try to solve the problem by doing one or more things, the problem tends to move on in the interim.

I urge a word of caution in our consideration of these matters. This morning, I spoke to Mr. Kelvin Boot of the national marine aquarium—I see that the Minister is nodding, so he is aware of Mr. Boot's contribution to these matters and the affairs of the aquarium. Mr. Boot told me that the boats and the porpoises, and the shoals that they follow, have moved inshore this year, which shows that the situation is not static, particularly in relation to fisheries. That is true of all problems that we tackle in various spheres of government.

I want to comment in passing on the role of the European Union, which the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), mentioned in an intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne. Among other things, the national marine aquarium is involved in the Biscay dolphin research programme, which it supports. The programme has shown that the common dolphin, which breeds in the bay of Biscay in the summer, moves to the western approaches off Devon and Cornwall in the winter. During the summer those animals are threatened by the tuna nets in the bay of Biscay, but are later exposed to the dangers off our coast about which we have heard so much today. We have been talking about both animal welfare and conservation issues. Dolphins are predators and as such prey on weak and sickly fish, which helps to maintain the health of the fish stocks. All that illustrates that fish do not recognise national boundaries, so we must come to an agreement when dealing with such matters.

Mr. Gray: I agree that it is essential that such matters should be agreed internationally, not only in the European Union, but across the globe. It is no good our saving porpoises and dolphins in Britain—it must be done everywhere. The question is by what means we should do so. It appears that the EU has been remarkably ineffectual in achieving those goals, which is why I call on the Government to take unilateral action.

Linda Gilroy: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. We shall probably have to agree to differ on how to address the problem. We may agree on what the common problem is, but the EU framework, difficult and frail as it might be, is better than trying to negotiate such matters separately and from outside such a framework.

Mr. Bradshaw: Does my hon. Friend agree that were the United Kingdom to be outside the CFP, we would have absolutely no leverage on other EU countries with which to do anything about the problem at all?

Linda Gilroy: I certainly agree. My hon. Friend has put the matter much more clearly and robustly than I just did. No doubt he will make such a robust case in his concluding remarks.

We must take urgent action to tackle today's problems, based on only the best available knowledge. In several years, however, we may wonder why something that at first appeared effective has not solved the problem. It is therefore vital that, while taking action within the bounds of our present knowledge, we should take further steps to research and understand how things work, why the fisheries move inshore, as it has been suggested they do, and what the consequences of that might be for the by-catch problem. Will it create greater dangers to porpoises and the bottlenose dolphins, which tend to come inshore, rather than seeking the deeper waters that the common dolphin inhabits? However, we cannot wait on that research before doing something because by then it may be too late to take effective action.

I conclude by again congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne on the Committee's work. I hear her passionate plea for article 7 emergency action. She made a powerful argument for seriously considering winter closure of the pair trawl sea bass fishery. I look forward to hearing from my hon. Friend the Minister, who I know has a good command of European matters and negotiations, as well as a strong commitment to animal welfare and marine issues.

3.24 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I, too, thank my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton), who chaired the Sub-Committee and took us through the report. Until I sat in on the Committee, I was largely ignorant of the cetacean crisis. It was entirely down to her inspirational leadership that we really got behind the issue and it was forced on to the agenda. Some of us would have liked to discuss other items, but she was absolutely committed to ensuring that it got the correct priority. We are grateful to her for that.

I am from the south-west, although that will surprise some people—[Laughter.] The Minister always thinks that am I bit dubious—in more ways than one. I make no apology—despite my accent—for saying that I come from the south-west. I have a coastline in my area, and dolphins and porpoises occasionally come up, if nothing else, to see the strange people on the Severn bore—perhaps I should add that I am not the Severn bore. However, those creatures occasionally come up to see the strange things that human beings do.

If I had a criticism of the DEFRA Committee, or the MAFF Committee as it was, it is that its members get somewhat used to death and occasionally have to deal with carnage. In this case, however, I have been really taken aback—it is almost a case of wilful murder. Some of our nearest relatives are being slaughtered for apparently purely economic reasons, and we do not really understand the repercussions. There is always a danger that we, as politicians, will go over the top in trying to get cheap publicity, but in this case we have a responsibility not only to our generation, which, I hope, is increasingly interested in the environment, but to future generations. Unless we take action now—this has been the common theme in all the speeches so far—things will get much worse; indeed, this is a catastrophe in the making.

There is a nice notion that we can set a target and say that 1.75 per cent., going down to 1 per cent., of the so-called population is expendable in terms of by-catch, but we do not know what the population is. New Labour might be good at setting targets, but we need a rough estimate of the overall size of the problem. Here we are setting targets, hoping that we can roughly gauge what is out there in the ocean, but it is as though we were simply holding our finger up in the wind. That is the most inappropriate use of targeting that I can think of.

I am increasingly interested in the marine environment. It was very useful that, at the same time as the DEFRA Sub-Committee was considering cetacean by-catch, the main Committee was considering the marine environment. That was not deliberate—we are not that well organised, although things sometimes happen when we stumble on an issue.

At the oceanography centre in Southampton, we were told in a very straight-faced manner that if people carried on the way they were going, they would probably wipe out half the species in the ocean over the next couple of decades, even though they did not know about them. Is it not staggering that there are so many things in our oceans that we are wiping out in total ignorance of their existence?

Ms Atherton: Does my hon. Friend agree that because that mostly goes on underwater, we do not see the devastation that we, as human beings, are inflicting on the oceans and the sea bed, and that there would rightly be an outcry if such things happened on land?

Mr. Drew: I agree entirely, although my hon. Friend has stolen part of my thunder. I was going on to say that if this was about seals being clubbed to death in Newfoundland, or the Japanese or the Norwegians catching whales, non-governmental organisations galore would be out there in their boats. I am not saying that this has not all of a sudden become a "sexy" issue to get behind, but it is the fifty-fifth minute of the eleventh hour, and we had better get on with it.

Mr. Bradshaw: Both my hon. Friends have raised the problem of public consciousness of the degradation of the marine environment. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) agree that the recent Hollywood film "Finding Nemo" has probably contributed more to increasing that consciousness than any politician's speech or almost anything else that has happened in the last few decades?

Mr. Drew: I am sure that that is absolutely right. I have not seen the DVD yet, but I am sure that I will enjoy it even more over Easter. While I am throwing out plaudits, it would be remiss of me not to congratulate the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) on his ten-minute Bill yesterday, which was most appropriate. I know that ten-minute Bills do not go anywhere, but now is a useful time for the Government to get behind the measures contained in it.

I do not want to be melodramatic, but this is an important issue on which the sands of time are running out. Who should be doing something about this? I do not want to get into knockabout stuff such as arguing that the EU is not a very effective organisation and blaming it for this. The EU is more on the side of the angels than the devils here. However, we cannot be complacent.

Apart from the immediate continental shelf, there is always a battle over who owns what and who will monitor how the seas and oceans are used. That inevitably causes a problem. We have to look carefully at the United Nations law of the sea because it is not just a European issue: it is acute in Europe, and we are beginning to try to address it, but there are nations outside the EU that are doing just as much damage. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say something about the international context, too.

I am also interested in the role that science should be playing. It was good to hear what my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) said about the centre in Plymouth—the Select Committee visited the oceanography centre—but until comparatively recently this area was not seen as the blue riband of scientific research. It may be getting better, but it needs to be given impetus. Until we know a bit more, we do not know what damage we are doing. It would appear that as we learn a bit more we find that we are doing a lot more damage than we thought.

Let us not fool ourselves. It is down to modern fishing techniques. If my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) were here, he would immediately launch into a full-scale attack on industrial fishing. He is the great protector of fishermen, although I sometimes think about kettles and pots. He is right, nevertheless. In the same way as intensive farming has begun to change our landscape for the worse in some respects, industrial fishing has done irreparable harm to our oceans. The simple fact is that it should not be allowed to happen. It should not be allowed to happen without control, because we know what the consequences are.

I hope that we can launch a full-scale attack on industrial fishing. It is not acceptable. We see what the side effects are. Issues raised include the size of the nets, the way in which trawlers work in tandem and the whole basis of the comprehensive destruction of the sea bed. That is something that we must do a lot about, because we are effectively culling whole species and not really worrying too much about it.

There is the issue of who pays for some of the things that have been highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne. There are no easy answers. Effectively, there are only three sources: fishermen, as part of the commercial exploitation involved in trying to catch stock; the Government; and the general public, who might get interested in the issue and pay NGOs to perform monitoring roles. We could be looking at slogans such as, "Buy a pinger today, and save a dolphin tomorrow." They are all fairly naff ideas, I have to say, but if we are serious about this, it is important that there is much more consciousness raising.

Mr. Gray: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a fourth group of people who might pay? I am talking about the people who eat bass. The truth is that people are already ready to pay significantly more for line-caught bass: it is £10 a kilo as opposed to £2 a kilo for bass caught in nets. It is perfectly reasonable to say that they must pay for the higher standards that we now demand.

Mr. Drew: I agree entirely. I suppose, in a sense, because the fishermen will pass the cost on wherever they can, and the public are also the consumers, we meet in the middle. Somebody has to pay the cost.

Ms Atherton: Does my hon. Friend agree that if the general public knew that dead dolphins were mixed in with industrially trawled sea bass, the market for that fish might completely disappear overnight?

Mr. Drew: That is inevitably the way. My hon. Friend will have to consider the time scale. If the situation does not rapidly get perceivably better, we will have to call for a full-scale ban. I concur with the hon. Member for Torbay. I would not mind a full ban now, but we must convince the industry that there is a logical underpinning.

The industry is going through a dramatic downswing. There is doubt about whether it is another mining industry, or whether it is an industry like farming that will suddenly pick up again. However, we must be honest with fishermen. They realise that the times of being able to go out and catch what they want when they want are long gone, but we must now decide whether there should be even more constraints. I know that the Minister has to come up with what he thinks is a wonderful deal to sell to the fishermen; they say it is a wonderful deal, but then talk to the press and say that he is the devil incarnate and anyone could have negotiated a different deal. We must be a bit more mature. The damage is such that we must take people along with us. There would be a huge impact on certain communities, but dolphins and porpoises are members of our mammal species and we ought to convince people that they are important as well.

What should we do, then? All the ideas that we considered—pingers, separator grids, putting observers on boats, better monitoring—have their drawbacks. The report explains that there is no silver bullet that the Select Committee can put in place and feel very satisfied about, with Parliament also doing its bit and the Government saying, "We've done our damnedest to get on top of this." All the ideas have negative repercussions as well as positive ones. However, we must do all those things, and do them much more effectively. We must convince the industry and the general public that the issue really matters.

I hope that Front-Bench Members will agree on the need to take action. There may be disagreement about what that action should be, and who should pay for it, but we owe it to the Select Committee, which has produced an excellent report—for which I claim some credit—to understand that it is not acceptable just to carry on as we are doing. There is a crisis. People do not see it, and not many people know about it, but it is a crisis. I hope that the Government realise that and act accordingly.

3.40 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): It is a great pleasure to take part in the debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) on her opening speech and on the report that the Select Committee produced. If I understand her argument properly, she is now calling for more action than the Committee called for. All the speeches that we have heard today seem to concur with that. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) on the ten-minute Bill that he introduced yesterday. Many of the thoughts expressed this afternoon were also expressed in his speech yesterday.

What strikes me immediately about the report—and other hon. Members have spoken about this—is the lack of knowledge about the problem. All of us will be appalled at the number of cetaceans that are found dead on our beaches along the southern coast of Cornwall, and, indeed, the north French coast. Those, however, are only a small proportion of the mammals that are harmed and killed by the commercial fishing of bass in the western approaches and the Celtic sea overall.

I have some experience in trying to estimate the populations of wild animals—birds, mammals and, on occasion, reptiles, in particular areas—and I know how difficult it is to do that satisfactorily and obtain accurate answers. However, I have never tried it in a marine environment. It must be very difficult to estimate the number of animals—especially mammals—in the sea.

The report states that the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has estimated that there were 300 to 500 bottle-nosed dolphins present, whereas the Joint Nature Conservation Committee's opinion was that the number was below 300. When we are talking about such small numbers anyway, that margin of error in the estimates must tell us something important, including that we need to get on and do something immediately.

I know from my work that sometimes we can be surprised and delighted to learn that animal populations that we thought were very small, to the point of being endangered, are much bigger than we thought. However, more often than not, populations seem to vary considerably in short periods of time. Occasionally when we produce estimates we find that populations have decreased considerably. When figures like 300 are arrived at, there is always a possibility that the species could reach a point of no return. There is a minimum number of animals in any population that is needed to maintain it as a breeding population. Going below that number means that extinction will certainly follow.

I was pleased that hon. Members touched on animal welfare. Dolphins and porpoises are mammals, and we understand that they are intelligent, sensitive animals. The public write letters—certainly to me—about the thought that these animals are harmed and hurt, let alone killed or destroyed as by-catches. I represent a constituency that has no coast. It is completely land-locked, although we are very pleased in Wales that porpoises are seen in Cardigan bay.

If I may misquote a constituent of mine, Lord Burns, who was producing a report on another matter, commercial fisheries severely compromise the welfare of small cetaceans—to put it mildly. A number of the Committee's recommendations must be considered closely.

The issue of pingers was outlined by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne: they could disturb the feeding areas of these mammals. It has also been put to me by experts on marine mammals' behaviour that the pingers could act as attractors if it became known within a population that fish shoals were in the area when the pingers were heard. It has also been suggested that pingers should be activated only when mammals have been detected in any area, and that leaving them on would either attract mammals or cetaceans there, or would have no effect. There is the question of the expense of purchasing them, fitting them to the fishing tack, maintaining them and ensuring that the batteries are working.

Ms Atherton: Is the hon. Gentleman perhaps aware that most of this equipment qualifies for European Union grants? The upkeep of the pingers would be the only cost to fishermen.

Mr. Williams: I understand that, and that point has been mentioned to me. There is the cost of the upkeep of the equipment. We must be certain that the equipment is used, not just in the fishing nets, but is switched on, maintained and kept in operation. I welcome the suggestion that observers in the fishing areas could estimate the extent to which cetaceans are caught and killed as by-catches. It will be a voluntary scheme, so the question is: how many fishermen would welcome the presence of observers, and how would we attract enough people of quality to undertake such work? People should have a sturdy and persistent character to ensure that records are kept and reflect what is happening in the fishing fleet.

Mr. Drew: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman. The worst weakness of the international community is the lack of a mechanism. To be fair to the British Government, we are prepared to recognise that there is a way forward. However, from what the Committee saw, there is no evidence that any other nation treats the issue seriously. That is a weakness.

Mr. Williams: I absolutely agree with the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps I shall say something about that later.

The suggestion that we have separator grids in the fishing tack has been accepted by some in the fishing industry and by people who have experience of the behaviour of marine mammals. However, it has also been suggested to me that sometimes such escape grids have been misplaced. Some of the cetaceans that escape from such nets are badly damaged. They may survive, but in some instances, the fins have been completely removed.

The worst excesses of the by-catch problem arise in the bass fisheries where pair trawling takes place. The bass fisheries are an important economic part of British fisheries and I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne that, although she wants to draw an end to pair trawling of bass or to place an emergency stop on it, she did not want to stop all commercial exploitation of bass. The hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) mentioned the increased amount of money that people are willing to spend on line-caught bass, as opposed to bass caught by pair trawling. I was told recently that the sport angling of bass, particularly off the Welsh coast, is an important industry, and I am sure that applies to the west country, too.

Ms Atherton: I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is an exceedingly popular sport off the coast of the west country, and it is very important for tourism.

Mr. Williams: It will put a lot of anglers' minds at rest to learn that they will be able to enjoy their sport again.

Many options are open to us. They include the use of ASCOBANS, which most northern European nations have signed, but not Spain and Portugal; the habitat scheme; special areas of conservation; and the common fisheries policy. All those tools are available to us. but they do not seem to have been used to achieve what we want—a complete ban on pair trawling for bass.

If I have any criticism of the report, it is that it was not explicit enough in asking for an emergency measure. The number of these animals is so low that we must use the precautionary principle, because we cannot say with great certainty when their population will become so depleted that the species may become extinct—not worldwide, but in some areas.

Ms Atherton: When we published the report, we were hoping for a resolution at European level. We wanted to give the European Union the opportunity to come up with a proposal that would have enabled the fishery to continue. It is because I am so disappointed at the resolution from the Fishery Ministers that I have moved forward from the report.

Mr. Williams: I thank the hon. Lady for her intervention. Somewhere in the report there is a reference to "our dolphins". I do not see the issue as nationalistic; dolphins and porpoises are migratory species—they migrate for feeding and breeding purposes and travel many hundreds of miles. The use of the word "our" should indicate that the issue is the responsibility of all members of the human species. We should look to other nations to take part in the process, too, because unless they are active in assisting us, we will not be successful.

I am critical of the Minister for being too timid in his approach to getting a satisfactory resolution in Europe—he will be able to tell us what he has been doing—because the great majority of these trawlers come out of French ports; very few are based in this country. To get a resolution, the Minister must take the issue up with Fishery Ministers in the European Union. Could Britain take some direct action not only within our territorial waters of six miles but within the 12-mile limit as well, where some of the inshore fishing takes place? Could he take action at that level to safeguard the welfare of marine cetaceans, certainly within our area?

Unless we take emergency action, we will not be doing our duty to safeguard these valuable species. We look forward to the Minister assuring us that he intends to take action and to do so very quickly indeed. If he does not, the future of the marine animals around our coast will be the Government's responsibility.

3.55 pm

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): It is a great pleasure, as always, to follow the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams). He and I agree on an enormous number of subjects to do with the countryside and wildlife, and I found myself agreeing to an almost worrying level with him and most of the other Members who have spoken this afternoon.

The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) used the word "collude" with regard to what the Front Benchers were about to do. I think that the only thing that we will collude in doing, as opposed to co-operate in doing, is making sure that we do not delay the Chamber for the entire hour and a half that is left to the Minister and me for our winding-up speeches. I will take the hour, but the Minister may well be a little shorter than me. In response to the Minister's worried look, I will try to keep it down to 45 minutes.

This is the second day that I have spoken in a debate in this Chamber on an animal welfare issue where I find myself in agreement with hon. Members from all three parties, although not necessarily with the Minister on either occasion. Yesterday, our debate was on the live export of horses for slaughter on the continent, and today, of course, it is on dolphins and porpoises. I took the opportunity to ride a horse into Parliament yesterday to publicise the issue, and I am delighted to say that I did not arrive today in my wetsuit, flippers and goggles. None the less, this is just as important an issue. I am glad to be in agreement, for once, with so many people throughout the Chamber.

First, I congratulate the Select Committee and the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) on an excellent report. This is a gripping issue. Someone said earlier that this is not a sexy area—I think that it is; it is extremely interesting. As is the case with so many issues of animal welfare that are increasing in salience, the people of Britain will be taking a keen interest in our discussions this afternoon. The report is very good, and I congratulate the hon. Lady on it. I also congratulate her on the elegance and precision with which she introduced her subject, despite a large number of interventions. It was a good exposition of the subject.

I also pay tribute to the Whale and Dolphin Conservation Society, which, I am delighted to say, is based in my constituency, in Chippenham. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire said that he had an inland constituency, as do I. North Wiltshire is probably the most inland constituency that I can think of; until recently, we had the most inland royal naval base at RN Copenacre. The society has been extremely helpful in providing briefing for this debate. It does a fine job in highlighting the issues and in fighting to do what it can to preserve whales, dolphins and porpoises.

I have some small degree of personal experience of the excellence of these animals. Every year, I go to Trebarwith Strand in north Cornwall. Last year, a whole school of dolphins came and swam with us—the only time that I have ever experienced that in British waters—and it was a wonderful experience. When I was the candidate in 1992 for Ross, Cromarty and Skye in north Scotland, we went backwards and forwards across the Moray Firth bridge. From the bridge, one can often see a school of dolphins—bottle-nosed dolphins, I think—playing in the surf. The first word that my son, who is now 20, said in life was "dolphin". That is probably a unique experience.

I speak with some personal feeling on the subject; curiously, a number of people referred earlier to the fact that a great many human beings do so. We have a greater affinity, in some ways, with dolphins and porpoises than we do with many other animals and even with many other mammals. There is something about dolphins and porpoises that is somehow like us, and we therefore speak with some passion on the subject.

There is no doubt about the continuing rate of tragic deaths experienced as a result of fishing. The report by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne talks about it at some length, and all the scientific evidence states that there is a significant and growing number of dolphin and porpoise deaths as a result of fishing.

As the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) said, we do not know whether deaths constitute 1 or 1.5 per cent. of the population because we do not know the size of the population or the percentage of deaths within it. It is impossible to work out, but even if it were 1.5 per cent., it is a significant number of deaths of animals with which we have a particular affinity.

The number of deaths is large, but they are particularly distressing deaths. I pay tribute to the Devon campaigner Linda Hingley, a trawler owner who set up the Brixham Seawatch. That has done superb work around most of the Devon and Cornwall coast keeping an eye in particular on how many dolphins have been killed. She said:

> "They are mammals and they need to come up for air and they can't. They drown in these giant nets."

That is a distressing thought—mammals, like us, drowning in nets and kept underwater for six hours before they can finally come up for air. Of course, by then they are long gone.

Mrs. Hingley went on to talk about how last year she had found 87 common dolphins dead in Devon alone, and many had ropes attached to their tails so that trawlermen could sling their heavy bodies over the side. Two had even been tied together having been caught in the same trawl. Local boats, whose nets trawl the sea bed, brought up rotting carcases. Often the bodies had puncture wounds, apparently made from the pair trawlers, so that they would sink. That way bodies would be less likely to reach the shore, thus disguising the scale of the problem. Mrs. Hingley said:

> "They cut right through to the hearts and lungs and get the air out of them. We have had a few which were obviously alive when they got them on board. They would have died of their injuries anyway."

That is an inhumane and disgraceful practice by anyone's standards, and it is important that we do something about it.

[Mr. James Gray]

The question before us, which has been discussed at length at the European Union, is what can we do about it. All in the Chamber agree that it is a huge problem; that the number of deaths is increasing; the way in which dolphins die is a disgrace; and that we must do something about it. That is the nature of the hon. Lady's excellent report. The consensus ends at that point, however. We should not be so consensual that the debate becomes dull; it is important to tickle the Government's tail and ensure that they are doing what they ought to.

That is why I was glad to come across a quotation on "Newsnight" from the then Fisheries Minister, now the Minister for the Environment, the hon. Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), who said he had "'breakthrough' evidence of dolphins being killed."

He added:

"What we have got as far as I am concerned is enough to take action and we intend to do that."

I thought, "That is terrific; the Fisheries Minister intends to take action." When was that? June 2000. Here we are four years later, and the Government have taken no action at all. They were keen to say that they would take action, that it was a very urgent, multinational problem and that we must do something about it, but they have done remarkably little.

The Minister shakes his head, but I will be glad to hear what the Government have done. Perhaps I am being unkind. I am sure they have done some things. They have certainly not solved the problem, however. Trawlers still go out in pairs and there are still significant numbers of deaths, despite the hon. Member for Scunthorpe saying that they intended to do something.

The Government have not done anything because up until now this has been viewed as an international problem—an EU problem—so we could not do something as a Government or a nation. I totally accept that it is no good us doing something on our own, but we must get other nations to do something. Also, there would be no point in just part of our great nation doing something about the problem; something must be done throughout the nation. We must get not only EU nations but a large number of nations—such as Baltic states, some of which are joining the EU, which might be helpful—to find ways of taking action across the world.

Some countries have done something. America banned dual trawling for sea bass long ago, but the Japanese have not. It is a question of leading not the EU, but the world. Even if it were a matter for the EU and by some magic means we could persuade it to do the right thing, we would not necessarily achieve the desired solution, because by definition international negotiations take some degree of compromise—the nature of the EU is that we must compromise. That is why I welcome the step that the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne has taken to go beyond what she asked for in her report. She says that we have tried the EU, but that route has not worked and we have been forced to compromise and downgrade.

Ms Atherton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gray: I will give way in a moment but I would not want to misquote the hon. Lady. She says that the EU has not delivered, so we must move forward and consider what national undertakings we can use to solve the dreadful problem.

Ms Atherton: I want the British Government to ask the European Commission to take action to close the fishery. That is different to what the hon. Gentleman suggested. I still want the EU to take action, but I want it to move further and quicker.

Mr. Gray: I hope that I did not misquote the hon. Lady. We would all like the Government to ask the European Commission to do something about the problem. No doubt the various commissions, organisations and committees in the European Union will discuss the issue, produce papers, compromise, downgrade the problem and do nothing about it. Four years after the "Newsnight" programme, on which the then Fisheries Minister said that he would take urgent action, nothing has happened because the EU is still discussing the issue. There will be another directive, another piece of paper, more discussions, more lobbying and more chats, but nothing will have been done. I accept that the solution must be sought through international agreement—we cannot act alone; we must persuade others to take action—but if the EU does not act, we should do it ourselves. We should lead from the front, demonstrate to the rest of the world what can be done and demonstrate to the EU that we will act and we want it to join us.

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman says that it is desirable to take action not only at European but at international level, and all hon. Members would agree with that. But how will that be done without a legally enforceable international system to govern the seas? We have such an agreement in the EU, but if we followed his party's policy of withdrawing from the common fisheries policy, we would not.

Mr. Gray: The Minister may not have realised, but the Atlantic is not part of the EU. There are perfectly acceptable fishing constraints between, for example, us, the United States, the Japanese and the Russians. Russian boats enter the Atlantic near my old constituency of Skye—most are huge trawlers and they are not constrained by the common fisheries policy because they are outside the EU.

The Minister is right to say that we must have international agreement on this and so many other environmental issues. Of course we must negotiate with other European countries, but we must also negotiate with the United States, Russia, Africa, India and the far east. The mere fact that we need international agreement on such matters does not mean that we have to be constrained by the bureaucrats who sit in Brussels thinking up difficult ways of not doing something. The fact that nothing has been done about the issue demonstrates the problem that I am talking about.

Last Monday, the EU produced new laws to try to prevent the awful killing of dolphins and porpoises, and I agree with my Conservative colleagues in the European Parliament that steps have been taken in the right direction to do something about it. However, the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne and others have commented on the fact that drift nets, in which dolphins become entangled, will be phased out by 2008 instead of 2007. That is another example of compromise, which is all we get from the EU. Boats under 12 m long will be exempt from the need to install pingers—I will talk about the benefits and disbenefits of pingers in a moment. By definition, if we have to act alongside our EU partners, the solution will be compromised and downgraded.

If we had control of our fisheries and waters we could show that we are determined to act. We could bring pressure to bear on our European partners and say, "We have done it, so why are you not doing it? Why is it, Mr. France and Mr. Spain, that you are still determined to kill hundreds of thousands of dolphins and porpoises through a practice that we gave up years ago?" I like to think that the British Government would remain powerful in persuading them to take action.

Control of our fisheries would also be advantageous in another area. I do not want to be too controversial, but the Minister's recent position on the haddock catch in Scotland has meant that haddock trawlers are now moving down to the south-west. We heard a moment ago from the hon. Member for Torbay that there are 12 Scottish trawlers operating in Plymouth. They are precisely the people who are contributing to the problem. If they were not prevented from catching haddock in their home waters in Scotland, they would not be busy down in the south-west catching sea bass, and therefore dolphins and porpoises by mistake.

There are a number of areas in which, by insisting on supporting the CFP, we are failing to act independently to solve the problem. The Whale and Dolphin Conservation Society in Chippenham has expressed its disappointment on the regulation tax, which it says has been "drastically watered down" from the original. It believes that "the EU has not done enough to prevent the unnecessary deaths of cetaceans in fishing nets, which are driving some populations towards extinction."

The society says:

"The EU has thrown away a major opportunity—compromising the survival of our marine wildlife in favour of commercial interests."

I am sorry to tell the Minister this, but it goes on to say:

"We are particularly angry that the Ministers have excluded vessels using pingers . . . from the requirement to carry observers. It is vital that if pingers are to be used, they must be monitored. If they are not used properly, porpoises will continue to die and if they are not being monitored, no one will know. We are also disappointed that so many vessels (under 15m in length) are to be excluded".

That was echoed by the WWF, which was "appalled" that EU Fisheries Ministers had delayed the ban on the introduction of drift nets. The International Fund for Animal Welfare—not an organisation that I tend to quote in support of my speeches very often—says that the EU has "missed a crucial chance to protect dolphins and porpoises from dying in fishing nets by caving into economic interests".

The organisations are saying that the EU, including our own Government, caved in to commercial interests and, by failing to take independent action in this country, the Government have endangered more and more dolphins and porpoises.

We have heard about the pingers and their downside. Some people say pingers attract dolphins into the nets rather than repel them. Others say that the pingers are drowned out by the noise produced by the trawlers. Other people say that the dolphins, rather curiously, do not want to go into the nets anyhow and go around the sides. There is scientific doubt about the value of pingers but it would be worth knowing more about them. The Government's recent survey of the use of pingers failed, not least because one of the television cameras fell off the net, which perhaps reduced it to the level of farce. I do not believe that enough work has been done to study what can be done.

Nearly everyone who knows anything about the subject would agree on one thing. Pair trawlers operate gigantic nets; they are about the size of 10 London double-decker buses. Two ships move along at high speed to catch the maximum number of fish. They catch an enormous quantity of fish, and an enormous number of dolphins and porpoises, as they go by. That is a purely commercial interest; the fishing industry says that it needs that size of catch to make fishing pay.

There is an alternative to that commercial interest, which we as a nation might like to promote, and some of us have mentioned it this afternoon already. That is long-line commercial fishing of bass with no nets at all. There is already a huge industry—not only one in which fish are sold to be eaten, but one of sport and tourism, as the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne mentioned. That catch, particularly the young catch, is being decimated by the gigantic nets, and the industry is very important in the south-west. I have seen the boys fishing with their long lines—I should say boys and girls to be politically correct. A fine industry is being damaged. If we were to enforce a unilateral ban on pair trawlers, it would save a significant number of dolphins and porpoises, but it would also be beneficial to long-line bass fishermen, who are part of an industry that we all want to preserve for so many reasons.

Mr. Sanders: I am very concerned about all this. My Bill yesterday was about banning such boats from UK waters, but I am under the impression that all that would be achieved is the saving of a few lives. That would be welcome, but the reality is that without the agreement of EU nation states, because of currents and wind conditions, dead cetaceans would still wash up on our shoreline. Therefore, we must have agreement with others, irrespective of our domestic policy on the subject.

Mr. Gray: Of course, I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps I should clarify my stance on the matter. I am not for one second suggesting that we should fall out with other nations, whether in the EU or elsewhere, on the subject. It is important that we enter into all kinds of agreements with nations around the world on this matter as on so many others, and it is important that we persuade the EU to do what we are doing; there is no question about that at all.

Cetaceans are not national resources; they move over enormous distances, but so do migratory birds, and the UK Government decide, in this Palace, who can shoot what and when they can shoot it, and what is banned. Nobody says that because migratory birds come mainly from Africa there is no point in doing anything unless we have a multinational agreement with Africa, and that we cannot do anything unless we get such an agreement. That would be the equivalent.

Because the multinational agreement in the form of the common fisheries policy demonstrably is not working, and because after seven years of a Europhile Labour Government nothing has happened, let us try to do something ourselves.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am not sure that I heard the hon. Gentleman correctly. He used the example of migratory birds. Is he aware that without the EU there would be absolutely no restrictions on the shooting of migratory birds in either France or Italy?

Mr. Gray: I am extremely well aware of that point. It is plain that the Minister was not listening. I agree that the shooting of migratory birds in France and Italy is controlled by the EU; however, it is not in the UK. It is controlled nationally, in that we control who shoots what and when. For example, the EU does not dictate the length of the shooting season. I thought that the Minister was in favour of shooting. He knows, for example, that the way in which wild geese are controlled in the UK is decided entirely in this Palace. We control it; it has nothing to do with the EU.

The Minister is right to say that it is very beneficial to persuade European partners and other nations to go the same way that we have. That applies to things such as negotiations on the convention on international trade in endangered species, for example, in which we persuaded other countries not to kill, or allow a trade in, elephants and other animals. That is not an EU convention but an international negotiation through which we reach agreement with the other CITES signatories.

If it has been demonstrated and is obvious to all that the EU is not doing what we want it to do, it is reasonable for us as a nation to decide what we will do. We can hope that our European partners follow us, but our action should not be dependent on their agreement to it. If the Minister seeks this afternoon to do anything other than pay lip service to the awfulness of killing dolphins and porpoises, he must give us some indication that he is ready at last to take the debate forward and at least to consider the notion of a UK unilateral ban on the use of pair trawling. That would be a significant step in the right direction, and I know that Members of all parties would very much welcome any such commitment.

4.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I thank all hon. Members, present and already departed, for contributing to this debate. I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) for securing it. I thank her and members of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee for their excellent report. I apologise that they were able to get sight of the Government's response to it only recently and hope that they understand that, because agreement was reached at the Council only last week, we needed some time to adjust our response to the report in the light of what had been agreed.

It is my strong view that my hon. Friend has done more than any other politician, not just in the United Kingdom but in the whole European Union, to bring the serious issue of cetacean by-catch to public attention. She does herself down a little. I understand why she concentrated on the areas of the Council agreement and the parts of the Government's response with which she was not satisfied. However, the honest truth is that, without her hard work representing not just her constituents but the various conservation and animal welfare organisations, the issue would not be so high on the agenda in this country or at the Council of Europe. She deserves a great deal of credit for that.

Everyone who spoke in the debate was right to say that the problem was serious. Hon. Members may be interested in the latest figures on strandings. Encouragingly, they show a fairly dramatic decrease from the high levels that we saw last year. Total strandings between 1 January and 31 March in UK waters of common dolphins and porpoises were 251 this year, compared with 379 last year. For dolphins, there were 84 this year, compared with 132 last year. For harbour porpoises, there were 125 this year, compared with 78 last year, so those figures have gone up. The figures are still extremely worrying and the historical trend over the past five years is not encouraging.

Ms Atherton: I thank the Minister for his kind comments. Does he accept that evidence is coming forward that some fishermen are going to extreme lengths to massage the figures by taking dreadful action to sink carcases when they are caught? Not all are doing that, but some are. Is that not one reason for the fall in the numbers, or is it that the bass fishery is reducing in size?

Mr. Bradshaw: Our bass fishery at the moment is bigger than it was last year, but there is evidence to suggest that the practice to which my hon. Friend refers takes place. However, I doubt whether it would account for such a big decrease in the numbers. The number of strandings is not necessarily an accurate indication of the level of mortality because many more porpoises and dolphins will not be stranded but will be caught up in by-catch.

Linda Gilroy: I wonder whether the interesting figures that my hon. Friend the Minister gave bear out what I reported in my contribution—that the shoals are moving in, so the porpoises tend to be inshore. The fishing fleet follows the shoals, and the falling figures may reflect that because the goalposts are moving.

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend is probably right.

Mr. Gray: I simply want to inquire of the Minister what he thinks the reason is for the numbers coming down. If he argues that action by the Government is satisfactory because the numbers are coming down, we need to know why they are coming down.

Mr. Bradshaw: It is too soon to speculate. I saw the figures only moments before the debate started, but I shall try to find out. As many hon. Members said, there is a lot we do not know and we need to carry out a lot of research to be able to implement effective action to solve the problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne went through a number of the recommendations made by the Select Committee. When I appeared before the Committee, I was sceptical about some of them and resistant to accepting them. Having reflected on them, we have made significant progress in moving towards meeting the requests and demands of her Committee, as she will have noted if she has had time to read the Government's formal response. I shall give two examples of some of the most important areas about which she was concerned.

One is the exemption that we would have liked for pingers within six miles. I consulted my officials and groups of environmentalists after the Committee published its report and agreed that we would drop that exemption before the Council meeting last week. Similarly, I hope that my hon. Friend will acknowledge that we moved significantly towards the position of the Committee in exempting the eastern Channel.

A number of hon. Members spoke about the politics of the European Council negotiations last week. One effect of the campaign by my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne and others is that Britain is probably in the lead on the matter in Europe, with the possible exception of Sweden. In Council, we argued for more radical measures to be implemented more quickly than those that were finally agreed.

The simple arithmetic of that Council was that we would probably not get agreement unless we compromised to a certain extent. A blocking minority of what I would describe as non-conservationist Governments would not have agreed to anything more radical. I am sure that hon. Members have noted that two countries still could not accept the agreement because they thought it too pro-conservationist: Spain and Italy both voted against it.

We could have gambled. Indeed, I threatened during the negotiations and in bilaterals with Commissioner Fischler to vote against the agreement because it did not go far enough. However, a combination of our votes and those of one or two other more conservation-minded countries, combined with the votes of the non-conservation-minded countries, would have led to our not reaching an agreement. I believe that it was important that we reached agreement last week because, after the accession countries come in, it will be even more difficult to get a majority for the sort of measures that we would like.

We were unhappy about the exclusion of under-12 m boats. I made that view clear but, after several hours of negotiation, I decided that it was better to have an agreement than not. I must correct something said by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams). The observer system is mandatory, not voluntary. When hon. Members read the agreement, they will see much that is not happening quickly enough or is not extensive enough; but it makes a good start on a Europe-wide basis.

Mr. Gray: Does the Minister agree that he is describing the very tragedy of the nature of the way in which European agreements are arrived at? In others words, what we have now is the lowest common denominator, because Europe could do no better.

Mr. Bradshaw: Quite the contrary. I was about to come to that point. It is unwise, to say the least, in a debate on cetacean by-catch for Conservative Members to remind everyone of the party's official policy of attempting unilaterally to withdraw from the common fisheries policy. As some of my hon. Friends and others have said, not only do dolphins and porpoises move around more than almost any other species—they have even less respect for national boundaries than other fish—but the problem is caused mainly by the boats of other nations.

If Britain was isolated in taking unilateral measures and putting its fishermen out of business to save dolphins and porpoises, how much leverage does the hon. Gentleman think we would have in persuading the French, Spanish, Italian or Irish Governments, or the European Union in general to take similar action? Absolutely none—no leverage whatever. It is only because Britain has taken a lead, in partnership with other EU countries, that we have the present agreement. For the benefit of hon. Members, I outlined the main points of the agreement—those that are worth pocketing—in the Government's response to recommendations 1 and 2. I shall not quote it as I do not want to detain the Chamber. I have copies for those hon. Members who have not yet received a copy in the post.

I accept the Committee's recommendation on harbour porpoises and pingers. We believe that there is merit in monitoring how the pinger implementation works after a period. It was on UK insistence that a review period was included in the agreement—we negotiated hard for it. The review will not happen as quickly as we wanted, but it was one concession that we managed to achieve from the Commission. Not only will that review happen but, as stated in the agreement, the Commission will be expected to act on the evidence derived from the pinger use and the observers. Incidentally, that observation will give priority to the bass pair trawlers, including the French boats, and will not be on a voluntary basis. The Commission will also be expected to act on the evidence garnered from the monitoring, which will also cover under-15 m boats. We pressed for that and believe that it is important.

Ms Atherton: Will the Minister be kind enough to outline where the observers will come from? Will they be from the fishing industry or conservation groups, for example?

Mr. Bradshaw: To quote from paragraph 1 of article 5 of the agreement, which deals with observers:

"Member States shall appoint independent and properly-qualified and experienced personnel."

That is something else that the Government insisted on inserting. We wanted not representatives of the fishing industry but independent scientifically qualified people. We persuaded the Commission to make it clear that the monitoring must be scientifically professional and testable, that annual reports had to be made by member states and that the Commission would be expected to act on them. For example, if the monitoring on under-15 m boats shows that there is a big problem, the Commission will be expected to act and we will press for that action.

Mr. Drew: As can be seen from the general tone of the debate, the observers will have to be robust, so what level of protection are they likely to have? We can smile or even giggle about that, but in reality to go out on a trawler with an adversarial crew will not be like sending someone to referee a football game but like sending them into Dodge city.

Mr. Bradshaw: My only experience in this area has been positive. The pelagic fishermen conducting the pair trawl from the UK fleet—the boats from Scotland—have been highly co-operative. As has been said, they do not like catching dolphins and porpoises and do not think that it is in their best interests to do so. They want to keep the fishery open and know that if we cannot find a way of avoiding the by-catch that we have seen in recent years, it may have to close.

The industry will be co-operative. Stringent reporting obligations on member states will be laid down in the regulations, which will set out exactly what they are expected to do. If they do not do it, or we believe that other countries are not fulfilling their obligations, we will expect the Commission to act. How those nation states decide to give the observers protection—if that is what they need—will be a matter for them.

I want to correct a point made by the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor), who is no longer in his place. Although it is slightly away from this debate, he made the argument that another reason for banning the bass pair trawl fishery is that it is being conducted at unsustainable levels. That is not the latest advice from the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea. Hon. Members from the official Opposition often challenge ICES advice, saying that it is far too conservationist, but this time its advice is that the fishing is being conducted at sustainable levels. I agree with what hon. Members have said about bass live fishery, and we encourage sustainable fishing, but there are currently no stock or conservation arguments to ban the bass pair trawl fishery.

Several hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne and the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders), have called for a ban on bass pair trawl fishery. Although the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) did not call for an immediate ban, he asked us to consider it, and I have said on a number of occasions that that is our position. However, I still have to resist the calls from other hon. Members to announce or instigate a ban now.

As I explained in response to the accusation by the hon. Member for North Wiltshire that the Government have taken no action, we have taken a number of steps. One involves the trials that we have been conducting in the bass trawl fleet using separator grids. As the Select Committee report acknowledged, those trials were extremely successful last year in reducing cetacean by-catch. The trials are continuing this year. The fishery will come to an end in the next three or four weeks. I have made it clear on more than one occasion that I am perfectly prepared to implement a unilateral ban if the results of the trials show that we have not found a solution to the problem. I am also prepared to explore the other option, which would probably be much more effective, because it would involve the whole fishery returning to the Commission and investigating the possibility of taking action under article 7.

Mr. Sanders: The Minister seems to be claiming a great victory as a result of separator grids. How many vessels use separator grids, and what is the evidence for a link between that and a reduction in by-catch? I am not sure how the two go together.

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman may have misunderstood me. I was not trying to explain this year's reduction in by-catch or reduction in strandings in terms of the success of separator grids. However, he will be aware, if he has read the Select Committee report, that last year's trials of two boats operating a separator grid were highly successful in reducing the by-catch to, I think, about two, whereas those boats would normally have expected to catch about 50 or 60 small cetaceans in that period. We are not quite clear how that happened, but I saw film of a shark that swam into the net, hit the separator grid and swam out through the flap, which is how the grid is supposed to work.

The trials are continuing this year. I am not asking hon. Members to be patient for much longer, because we expect to know the outcome of the trials in the next few weeks. I have said time and again—I am not creating any news today—that I will not rule out any action when I see those results, but there is not much point in jumping the gun and pre-empting the results.

Mr. Gray: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we must not prejudge the outcome of the trials. None the less, he mentioned the film footage of a shark. Will he accept that there is evidence that some sharks have used the separator grid, but there is no evidence of a dolphin or porpoise doing so?

Mr. Bradshaw: There was not last year, but I have deliberately not tried to find out what is happening this year, because if a proper scientific experiment is being conducted, we should let the scientists do it. It is being conducted by probably the most respected marine biologists in the world. I await the outcome of this year's trials with as much interest as everyone else.

Ms Atherton: My hon. Friend says that he will have the results of the trials in a few weeks Will he make the results public? Will he let the Select Committee know them and make them known more widely among hon. Members?

Mr. Bradshaw: Absolutely. If my hon. Friend would like to prepare parliamentary questions that she can table when this is over, I can enlighten her and other hon. Members in that way.

Mr. Sanders: I want to return to the impression that the Minister has given. He mentioned that two vessels may have avoided catching 50 or 60 cetaceans. Let us consider the figures in the document. How many vessels are out there? If we multiply that number by 50 or 60, we wipe out the entire population—not 1 per cent. but the entire population. The figures do not add up. It cannot be 50 or 60.

Mr. Bradshaw: I think that the hon. Gentleman is becoming confused between common dolphins and bottle-nosed dolphins. I am sorry that he takes a confrontational approach. His Bill is jumping the gun; it is premature. As the hon. Member for North Wiltshire said, it would be ridiculous to make an announcement now, when we do not know the results of the trials. The trials were highly successful last year.

The percentage matters more than the actual number. There has been a huge percentage reduction in the number of cetaceans that that fishery has caught compared to what it would have been expected to catch in a normal year without separator grids; the number decreased from 50 to two when separator grids were used. That is a massive reduction. We do not know whether there will be such a reduction this year, but we should wait for the results rather than jumping the gun as the hon. Gentleman is trying to do with his ten-minute Bill.

Once those results are known, I am prepared to consider any action. I am keen to investigate the possibility of the use of article 7, as suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne. That would be far more effective than any unilateral measure because, at present, there are six UK pairs and 30 French pairs operating in the bass pair fishery, so even if the UK were to implement a unilateral ban, that would tackle only the lesser part of the problem. As the agreement that we concluded last week shows, much more can be achieved if we can persuade other EU members to follow our lead.

With regard to the recommendation made by the Select Committee on special areas of conservation under the habitats directive, we are considering the identification of such areas for the harbour porpoise. Later this year, we expect to receive the conclusions of that work, together with recommendations for areas to be identified. That is outlined in our response to the Committee's recommendation 17.

Finally, I should like to address the more general marine environmental issues that were raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy). It is useful that they placed this debate on the problem of cetacean by-catch in the broader context of a sustainable fishery. The UK is in the lead in the EU and the world in trying to move our fishing industry away from the unsustainable approach taken in many of our fisheries that was outlined by several hon. Members and towards a marine environmental approach. That will also be the best way of guaranteeing a long-term future for the fishing industry. If we do not fish our fish stocks at sustainable levels, there will be no fish left for fisherman to catch, sell and make a living from.

In that context, it is worth highlighting the recent publication of the Prime Minister's strategy unit report on the long-term future of the fishing industry. It is the first time that any Government have stood back and taken a hard strategic look at the state of the industry and where we need to move to in the future. If hon. Members have not already had the opportunity to read that report, I hope that they will do so. It offers us a once-in-a-generation opportunity to put the whole of the fishing industry on to a sustainable basis for the future, so that fishermen from the communities that many hon. Members represent can make a living, but fish stocks and the whole of the marine environment are conserved and protected. The marine environment is one of our most important resources but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne rightly says, it has been neglected in the past because, to most people, it is not visible.

Ms Atherton: I thank all the hon. Members who have taken part in the debate. There was a fair degree of harmony in the debate—with one or two outbreaks of disharmony—but overall we recognised that this slaughter must stop.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for his kind words. Many people are doing much work on this issue. I pay particular tribute to conservationists in Devon and Cornwall who have been enormously helpful in gathering the evidence. It is our job to raise these issues in Parliament; the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders), who has had to leave, also made a useful contribution to the debate.

I accept that the Government have moved the EU forward, but I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister recognises that it is our job to keep pushing and pushing the Government. We need to go further. I am pleased that he will think seriously about article 7 in terms of the pair trawl fishery. I think that it is unsustainable. Many hand line fishermen in my constituency would raise a glass or two of Cornish ale if they heard that the ban was going to happen.

Linda Gilroy: I think that the Bass Anglers Sportfishing Society might raise a glass as well. In a tagging exercise that it conducted recently with the Government Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquacultural science, it discovered that 80 per cent. of the tagged fish in the river area fisheries turned up in the bass pair trawlers.

Ms Atherton: It is a very live issue. I am glad that it was raised in the wider debate. My hon. Friend is right to raise it. In fact, I am meeting representatives from that particular fishery in my surgery tomorrow, so it will be important and helpful to report back to them.

I say to the Minister that the issue needs addressing. I look forward to the results, but we will keep coming back to it. The people will demand it. We have to be a voice for the cetaceans.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have finished a moment or two early. I congratulate all those who participated in discussing what is clearly an important issue. It has been a fascinating debate to listen to. I wish every Member a restful and enjoyable Easter break.
